

THE MUSICIAN'S BOOKSHELF

EDITED BY CLAUDE LANDI

CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS

The Musician's Bookshelf

- (1) PRACTICAL SINGING, by CLIFTON COOKE.
- (2) MUSICIANS OF TO-DAY, by ROMAIN ROLLAND.
- (3) SOME MUSICIANS OF FORMER DAYS, by ROMAIN ROLLAND.
- (4) ON LISTENING TO MUSIC, by E. MARKHAM LEE, M.A., Mus. Doc.
- (5) COUNTERPOINT, by BERNARDI.
- (6) PEDALLING IN PIANOFORTE MUSIC, by A. H. LINDO.
- (7) OUTSPOKEN ESSAYS ON MUSIC, by CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS.
- (8) CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS: HIS LIFE AND ART, by WATSON LYLE.

CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS

This is believed to be the last studio photograph, taken in 1921, before the death of the master.

CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS

HIS LIFE AND ART.

BY

WATSON LYLE

WITH A PREFACE BY LEFF POUSHNOFF

ILLUSTRATED WITH A PORTRAIT OF CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS, AND MUSICAL ILLUSTRATIONS IN THE TEXT

LONDON :
KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRUBNER & CO., LTD.
NEW YORK : E. P. DUTTON & CO.

1923

Printed in Great Britain by St. Stephen's Printing Works, Tontine Buildings, Bristol.

I dedicate this book to the memory of my parents, who, from early childhood, guided and encouraged my love of music; and to whom, therefore, I largely owe the unfailing joy, and solace, which music brings to me.

WATSON LYLE.

*The White House,
Navestock,
'Essex.*

PREFACE

Every time the world loses one of its great ones, we instinctively feel the desire to turn our thoughts back in order to recall to our minds the principal events of his life. We are thus enabled to form our conclusions and find his rightful place in history.

All musicians, professional or amateur—all music-lovers, in fact—will welcome this opportune book on the life of that great musician, so extraordinarily gifted with the talents of composer, pianist, and organist—
CAMILLE SAINT-SAENS.

I have not the slightest doubt that this work of Mr. WATSON LYLE's will meet with a great success. The reader may see for himself with what love and care the author has carried out his task. He will be interested in the series of events from the musician's life chosen by the author and impressed by his logical sequence and convincing way of grouping them. He will likewise understand that only a true musician could give such a clear-sighted analysis of the composer's works, and will be duly grateful to the author on this account also.

For my part I congratulate Mr. Watson Lyle most sincerely on his book and wish him the great success which he deserves.

LEFF POUISHNOFF.

AUTHOR'S NOTE

I gratefully acknowledge the information kindly given me, towards the writing of this book, by the following friends :—Mme. Amina Goodwin, MM. H. A. Dean, Felix Goodwin, Arthur de Greef, Richard Hammond, Robert Moor, Leff Pouishnoff, H. Thompson, William L. Tilbrook, and Messrs. J. and W. Chester.

MM. A. Durand and Fils, Paris, have courteously authorised me to give the musical quotations.

WATSON LYLE.

CONTENTS

	PAGE
PART I: THE GROWTH OF A GENIUS	I
PART II: THEME I. ARTISTIC POWERS AND OUTLOOK	46
THEME II. SOCIAL LIFE AND OPINIONS	67
PART III: THEME I. THE CONCERTOS	83
THEME II. THE SYMPHONIES AND SYMPHONIC POEMS ...	104
THEME III. CHAMBER MUSIC	125
THEME IV. VARIAZIONI	135
THEME V. WORKS FOR THE STAGE ...	146
THEME VI. THE CHORAL WORKS ...	171
THEME VII. LITERARY WORKS	177
APPENDIX	188

PART I

THE GROWTH OF A GENIUS

The records of the lives of the musically great impress one with the fact that the musician of exceptional merit, the master whose pre-eminence and genius is revealed by originality of achievement in his art, has usually given unmistakable evidence of his powers in early childhood.

But conversely, prodigies do not invariably develop into masters, or even into artists of outstanding merit. Too often the flame of genius in early life burns, and is encouraged to burn, with a fierceness that consumes the forces of supply at their source, and drains the reserve.

One can only feel anger with the elder Mozart at the manner in which he exploited the heaven-born talent of his son. Judiciously tended and cared for in early years, it is reasonable to assume that the pathetically brief life of the master might have run a longer, and even more important, course than it did.

Commencing to write this book upon Charles

Camille Saint-Saëns, one involuntarily reflects upon the signs of the possession of great musical gifts which the Austrian and French masters showed at a similarly tender age. Yet, had the physical and artistic growth of the French child been attended to in haphazard fashion there can be little doubt that posterity would not have heard of him; and that the art of music, and the development of it would have been poorer to the extent of his ceaseless productivity during close upon seventy of the full eighty-six years of his life.

Civilisation, in the formation and progress of which musical art has been, and is, an important factor, is under a debt to the memory of Mme. Saint-Saëns and of her aunt, Mme. Masson, for the wise and unremitting care which they devoted to the delicate infancy of the composer: and to the extreme care with which they helped, but avoided forcing, the inflorescence of his genius.

The fragile baby, born at No. 3, Rue du Jardinot, Paris, on the 9th October, 1835, certainly embarked upon his long life here under a severe handicap. Saint-Saëns, père, with the scourge of consumption already well advanced in his system at the time of his son's birth, died a couple of months later, on December 31st, just a year after his marriage. Medical opinion favoured the view that the germs of the disease had been communicated to the child.

Regarding his ancestry, Saint-Saëns has written that "this relationship (i.e., with his maternal grand aunt) makes me a descendant of General Delcambre, one of the heroes of the retreat from Russia." And further, "My grand aunt was a precocious child—she walked at nine months—and she became a woman of keen intellect and brilliant attainments."

Mme. Masson adopted her niece, Clemence Collin, who in due course married M. Saint-Saëns, "a minor official in the Department of the Interior."

After the loss of her husband the young mother returned to the protection of her aunt, now also widowed, and on the advice of the doctors the infant Camille was left in the country with his nurse, at Corbeil.

The baby of two years who was brought back to the two women in Paris had become comparatively robust, and they, whom in after-life the master alluded affectionately to as his "two mothers" devoted themselves whole-heartedly to his growth, physically, intellectually and psychically.

His early environment was thus most congenial for his artistic growth; and the fine fruition to which his career attained is eloquent proof against the generally promulgated theory that genius often thrives best under hardship.

Both Saint-Saëns and Mozart possessed an unflinching and attractive melodic inspiration, a facile technique, and a subtle appreciation of tone colour, although their sense of melody and colour differed. But the brief life of Mozart was one of grinding poverty, while up to the time of his death Saint-Saëns had little cause for monetary worry. These material circumstances give interest to the differing personalities expressed in their works; but they do not wholly explain it.

By outward indications of natural endowments, these two composers began life upon a fairly equal footing. But the difference in soul, personality, call it what you will, points to the existence of elements other than natural endowments and material circumstances in the evolution of genius—elements that are possibly born of emotional experiences which thus find an outlet and are reflected in the creative work of the artist.

The loving care, tempered by sound common sense of the two women upon whom, by natural circumstance, devolved the care of this genius in embryo, is surely reflected in the warm humanity of his music, and in the clearness of thought and adaptability to the opportunities of life that contributed largely towards the eminence of his professional career.

The little child of two and a half years old seated at the piano, pressing down the keys one by one and obviously experiencing great pleasure in listening to the gradual evaporation of each sound, to the formation of the upper-partials thus created, before depressing the next key that, in its turn held the "Open, Sesame!" to new wonders, was not admonished to cease trifling with the piano. He was not ordered to concentrate upon the cabalistic meaning of E.G.B.D.F. and F.A.C.E. He has recorded that the tales of the whippings and force used to make him learn his notes are sheer rubbish. The truth is that his great aunt, who undertook his preliminary musical education, gave the lessons a live interest for the little student by showing him the identical relationship of these mysterious signs with the sounds which he could create for himself and which he loved so well.

Thus early, then, was born and nourished the sensitive feeling for tone colour that distinguishes the art of Saint-Saëns.

His innate sense of absolute pitch was shown when he correctly named, from an adjacent room, the sounds evoked by the tuner when tuning the piano. That was indeed a great game; almost as good fun as the gradual crescendo of hissing noises emitted by the big kettle "which was hung before the fire in the drawing-room every morning."

The "Method" (i.e., instruction book) used by Mme. Masson was Le Carpentier's, and the eager child romped through it in a month. Such rapid progress betokened dangerous activity of the young brain, and the piano was closed and the lessons suspended; but, as he himself tells us in his delightful "Ecole Buissonnière," he "cried like a lost soul," and his aunt resumed the lessons.

His theoretical and practical knowledge advanced so rapidly that his initial attempts at composition began at the age of four; and when little over four and a half he excited much interest by his performance of the piano part in a Beethoven sonata for violin and pianoforte before a semi-private audience in the drawing-room of friends of his mother and aunt.

At that time he was frequently taken to the house on the Quai Voltaire where the painter Ingres lived with his wife. Perhaps in this early friendship may be traced the dawning of ambitions and ideas of future greatness, for the painter talked to the child of Mozart, Gluck, Beethoven, and other great masters of music; and in his hero-worship the child of six dedicated an Adagio (how grave is youth!) of his own to the man. Ingres, to show his appreciation of the compliment, gave his little friend a small medallion portrait of Mozart, with an inscription on the reverse side, "To M. Saint-Saëns, the charming interpreter of the divine artist." Saint-Saëns, at that age, played Mozart's simpler piano sonatas exceedingly well.

In regard to the executive powers of the child it is worthy of record that the drawing-room concert alluded to evidently revealed a young artist of such promise that the "Moniteur Universel" of 1.8.1840 gave the circumstance publicity.

Stamaty, a brilliant disciple of Kalkbrenner, undertook the continuance of his pianistic tuition at the age of seven, and he expressed his satisfaction at the soundness and completeness of Mme. Masson's teaching. There was, he said, nothing to do but perfect it.

The teacher of composition at Stamaty's school was a certain M. Maleden, who had perfected a wonderful system of harmony invented by Gottfried Weber, with whom he had studied in Germany. Maleden and his young pupil, Saint-Saëns, sometimes had heated discussions upon certain explanations that seemed obscure to the alert intelligence of the boy. The teacher, a kind and somewhat timid soul, would hold the boy's head down close to the table in an endeavour to force him into a promise of blind obedience. But as the refractory youth stuck to his own opinions, and refused to alter them by brute force, the master was generally driven into a compromise. Soon after he commenced his studies with Maleden, the boy, anxious to experiment with this addition to his knowledge of music, began serious composition. His creative bent turned into the direction of a pianoforte sonata; and overtures, cantatas, and songs were also written, none of which the artist of maturity allowed to be published.

He was already becoming known in the salons of fashionable Paris, in the half-patronising, half-wondering manner in which clever children attract attention in artistic and quasi-artistic circles the world over. At the house of Ingres he met Delsarte, who ruined his own voice and those whom he "trained"; and Henri Reber, whom in maturity he was to succeed at the Institute. His musical pabulum at this time consisted chiefly of the works of J. S. Bach, Beethoven, and Mozart, with a leavening of pianoforte composers of the day, such as Kalkbrenner.

Other executive artists have made their official débuts as pianists at an earlier age than Saint-Saëns did, and have sustained careers of undiminished brilliance—Carreño, for instance, first appeared at the age of nine and was a distinguished artist for the remaining fifty years of her life—but I cannot recollect any who have appeared as prodigies during the lifetime of the great Frenchman and who developed to the same extent as he did.

Stamaty decided that he was sufficiently advanced to be definitely launched upon his professional career, and a concert was arranged for him in the Sallé Pleyel, Paris, on May 6th, 1846. He was, therefore, ten years and seven months old when he made his début.

An Italian orchestra, conducted by Tilmant, was engaged for the occasion. The young artist played the parts for solo pianoforte in Beethoven's Concerto No. 3 in C minor and in a Mozart Concerto in B flat. He also played some smaller pieces, a Sonata of Hummel, a Prélude and Fugue of Bach, and items of Handel and Kalkbrenner. All these he played from memory, which was not only very unusual at that time, but, even many years later, was an innovation that was frowned upon by the hide-bound pedants. This concert was a tremendous success, and the boy was hailed by the press of the day as a second Mozart.

Stamaty (teachers then and now appear to have been very similar !) was keen to exploit his amazingly talented pupil, and there was some talk of a performance at the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire. Seghers, who afterwards proved such a good friend to the boy, objected because he detested Stamaty; and he was a power in the conduct of the orchestra. However, the teacher persisted in his attempts to induce Mme. Saint-Saëns to allow her son to appear at more concerts, but she, deciding that the fleeting success of a hardly-worked prodigy should not be allowed to endanger the triumph of the matured artist, declined to consider the matter, and a coolness resulted which ended the tutorship. A friend remonstrated with Mme. Saint-Saëns for allowing her boy to play Beethoven Sonatas, then considered food for grown-ups only. In reply to the sarcastic enquiry as to what music her son would play when he was twenty she made the strangely-prophetic reply that he would play his own. Saint-Saëns has related the incident at length in his "École Buissonnière."

During the half-dozen years that followed, his attention, excepting for a few public appearances, was directed to his further education, musical and general. At the age of fourteen Stamaty introduced him to Benoist, at the Conservatoire, and the boy was seated at the keyboard of the organ to see what he could do. But he was so frightened at the strange sounds elicited that the class laughed, and Benoist only agreed to accept him as a listening pupil for organ.

He "listened" during classes to considerable purpose, and also worked hard at home studying the "Forty-eight" of Bach, and one day, when all the chosen pupils failed at the instrument, Benoist bethought him of his "ugly duckling" and ordered the child to play. This he did, to the utmost satisfaction of the teacher, who then accepted him as a regular pupil. That year he won the second prize, and but for his youth would have been awarded the first. Benoist, who was an excellent teacher, but a quite ordinary player, paid more attention to the youth after that, and frequently chatted with, and encouraged, him, apart from his regular lessons.

Maleden fortunately completed the instruction of his pupil in harmony, counterpoint, and fugue. One writes "fortunately" advisedly, because Halévy, under whose care he passed at the age of fifteen for composition, while a student at the Conservatoire, discharged his responsibilities as a teacher in a most haphazard fashion. Frequently Halévy would not turn up, and usually he was deeply engrossed, at classes, in composing opera and opéra-comique of the made-to-order brand that never survived more than a few performances. He was a kind-hearted, and evidently weak-willed, soul, and gave audiences to all manner of possible and impossible singers who called to see him at the Conservatoire about engagements in his productions. In his absence the young genius would betake himself to the library and there devour the scores of ancient and contemporary composers with all the enthusiasm of early youth. Had he not been already well grounded in the fundamental technique of composition this negligence of Halévy might, of course, have proved very detrimental to his progress. As it was, the score reading helped his ideas of orchestration as much, probably, as reams of paper work could have done.

Compositions of various kinds were sketched out or completed during the years at the Conservatoire, but the faculty of self-criticism engendered by his common-sense training decreed the consignment of the majority of these early works to oblivion. An idea of the correctness of his estimate of his own early work may be gained from the fact that his first entry for the Prix de Rome in 1852 was unsuccessful. However, later in that year, he won a prize for composition offered by the Société de Saint Cécile, recently inaugurated by Seghers, with an "Ode" to the Saint.

Two years previously, when Saint-Saëns was fifteen, Seghers planned a series of concerts at which the boy was to appear as solo-pianist. But the project had to be abandoned because of the incurable nervousness of Seghers whenever he attempted to play, as a violinist, in public. Apparently, too, he belonged to that unfortunate section of humanity whose enthusiasm for a new idea far exceeds their tenacity of purpose in putting it into practice.

In December, 1852, Saint-Saëns was appointed to his first professional post. This engagement, as organist in the Church of Saint Méry, he held for five years.

The following year his symphony in E flat, not published until 1855, was produced by the Société de Saint Cécile, anonymously, under Seghers. Prejudices against the performance of works by unknown composers (as if everybody has not been, at one time "unknown"!)

was even greater then than now, and Seghers knew very well that if the symphony was put before the committee as signed by his young friend it would be contemptuously tossed aside. He therefore said that it had been sent to him, anonymously, from Germany.

The symphony was enthusiastically praised. At the rehearsal the youth of eighteen, all trembling for the success of this year-old child of his brain, listened to a conversation regarding it between Berlioz and Gounod, who were already interested in him, but were unaware that he was the author of the work they had just heard. They freely discussed the good and bad points of the composition and were naturally greatly astonished when they learnt, after the public performance, that the young man, whose ideas they had sought to improve by their discussion of the new symphony, was actually its composer.

This work may be regarded as signalling the beginning of the master's career as a composer. It will be considered in detail later, with its numerous and varied successors. We are mainly concerned here with the influences and affairs of private life that may be regarded as having helped to shape the art and life of Saint-Saëns.

This incident of the rehearsal went towards the cementing of his friendship with Berlioz and Gounod, both of whom took a very real and helpful interest in his early life. At that time Gounod wrote him a short, but noble, letter of congratulation upon his success. He pointed out the moral responsibility that his natural endowments placed him under to become a "great master" and adjured him to persevere. The letter was treasured by its recipient throughout his life.

Saint-Saëns' sympathetic insight into human nature probed beneath the outward crust of moroseness and arrogance which Berlioz presented to society in general. His own disposition, optimistic and sunny, even to the extent of frivolity, was so utterly different from that of the forbidding Hector that, by the law of the attraction of opposites, one can readily comprehend the affectionate regard in which he held Berlioz.

Gounod understood pretty clearly the composition of Saint-Saëns' psychological make-up; and he had a well-balanced appreciation of the the strong and weak points in his technical armoury.

He recognised the chameleon-like adaptability that was at once a strength and a danger to the young composer. A strength, because of the ability to absorb impressions of "local colour" and exotic idioms which it gave him, along with a complete understanding of the art of his contemporaries, Rossini, Verdi, Schumann, Mendelssohn, and Wagner, to mention the barest few who were in the van. And a danger, in case it should prevent originality of expression and cause him to degenerate into a mere imitator. When Gounod said of him, "He writes as he feels, and with what he knows," he demonstrated his perfect comprehension of the character and methods of Saint-Saëns.

A visit to Rome with the Abbé Gabriel, curé of the Church of Saint Méry, enabled the composer to hear the famous singers of the Sistine Chapel. But there is no record as to whether he attempted to write out from memory the music which he had heard, and which is so zealously guarded against access by the casual visitor; and thus to emulate the famous achievement of Mozart, who, after a similar visit in 1770, wrote out the whole of the Miserere of Allegri, which is composed for two choirs of nine voices. The abbé took his young organist to Rome as a sign of his appreciation of the Mass that Saint-Saëns had dedicated to him.

The youth, maturing to manhood, was no moody recluse. Fond of gaiety and change, he found congenial relaxation from his studies and from composing and his profession as an executant, in the by no means heavy musical fare provided at the Opéra-Comique.

His mother held Monday evening receptions at her flat in Paris, and at these he was often the personification of fun and high spirits. On these occasions music was, quite inevitably, the paramount attraction; and it is evident that these reunions provided opportunities for meeting personalities likely to be interested in Saint-Saëns and likely to be of importance in his career.

The young artist and his friends frequently arranged operatic performances, in costume, for the receptions, to the entertainment of the guests. Saint-Saëns often assumed the rôle of a female character, a type of impersonation for which his high-pitched voice particularly suited him.

The salons of Mme. Viardot, a friend of Mme. Saint-Saëns, a sister of Mme. Malibran, and, of course, famous as a singer and teacher of singing in her day, were also the scene of these revels, as well as the rendezvous for chamber music performances and recitals of a private kind by the singer and her friends. On one of these evenings at Mme. Viardot's Saint-Saëns appeared in a burlesque of Gounod's "Faust" as Marguerite, discovering the jewels and mirror in the casket, and warbling the florid music of the heroine! At Mme. Viardot's he listened to a performance, by his hostess and Clara Schumann, of a duet Sonata by Schumann.

He was a frequent visitor to the home of the Seghers, and it was there, one memorable day, at the age of eighteen, that he first met Liszt.

The great pianist had been so long absent from Paris that his reappearance was in the nature of a resurrection. His personality and playing made a profound impression upon Saint-Saëns, and he included the young Frenchman in his circle of protégés of art—this great, good, and generous-minded artist to whose help and encouragement so many young musicians of that and the previous decade owed recognition and success.

M. and Mme. Viardot took Saint-Saëns to one of Rossini's famous "evenings" in his splendid apartment at the corner of the Chausée d'Antin. Saint-Saëns was received by the distinguished Italian composer with the superficial cordiality that he extended towards those who were brought to him, possibly as pianists or composers desiring his social and artistic patronage. After the production of "Guillaume Tell," Rossini rested upon his laurels, and in a social way, in Paris, basked in the after-glow of his earlier triumphs in art. To be a frequenter of his soirées gave a cachet of distinction to the professional reputation of young artists; and it must be admitted that, as in the case of many another such "court" both before and since, the courtiers consisted largely of flatterers and parasites upon art, all of whom, however, Rossini appears to have valued at their true worth.

When he learnt that his young visitor could most certainly not be placed in the category of any of these self-seekers, and was undoubtedly an artist of promise, he altered his attitude of patronage and invited his guest to pay him a morning call.

Rossini, on more intimate acquaintance, proved to be very different from Rossini the courted and flattered. His ideas upon musical art of the day were at least broad and noble, if they were a little out of date. Saint-Saëns became a frequent visitor at his house and often played or acted as accompanist at the evening receptions at the appartement in the Chausée d'Antin.

The first performance of the Tarantelle (Op. 6) for flute and clarinet was arranged for one of these receptions by Rossini, to take place under circumstances of anonymity that recall the initial performance of the Symphony in E flat of the young composer.

Two noted artists of the day, Dorus and Leroy, readily agreed to play the duet, and as there was no written programme the guests were under the impression that the new work was from the pen of their host.

At the conclusion of the soirée musicale the flatterers and fawning admirers pressed their congratulations upon Rossini, acclaiming the composition as a masterpiece. The elderly musician allowed the practical joke to run to its uttermost limits in this way, and then, taking hold of his protégé's hand, announced the authorship of the duet and quietly "floored" the sycophants.

The incident was worthy of the mood which prompted Saint-Saëns to write a one-act parody, "Gabriella di Vergy," upon the old-style Italian opera, for performance by himself and his friends at one of his mother's "Monday" receptions.

When one remembers that during these years (1852-8) he wrote, in addition to the works particularly mentioned, another symphony, which, with its immediate successor in that form, remains unpublished, concertos for pianoforte, and for violin, and orchestra, the Messe Solennelle, about which Liszt wrote to him so encouragingly (on 19.7.1869), besides many smaller pieces, one realises that indulgence in relaxation did not lead to any slackening of his energies professionally.

The next position as organist which he filled was at the Church of the Madeleine. He commenced an engagement there, in 1858, that lasted nineteen years, and afforded him a yearly remuneration of f.3,000.

In addition to the material certainty which this appointment carried, it was an exceedingly helpful one, because of the professional status and social opportunities connected with it, and that rendered the post a fortunate one from every point of view. His immediate predecessor was Lefébure Wély, famed as an improviser more than as a composer; and his successors were Théodore Dubois and Gabriel Fauré, both of whom became distinguished in musical art.

Saint-Saëns was appointed to a professorship at the École Niedermeyer in 1860, but relinquished his duties there in 1863. Fauré was a pupil of his during that time, and so also was André Messager.

He had often seen Richard Wagner during his constant attendances, as a ~~child~~, at the Société des Concerts. Wagner was then a young man, and he also went to the Société frequently. But the famous meeting between the two composers did not occur until 1861, at the Opéra, when the ability of the young Frenchman to play at sight, on the pianoforte, from complicated full scores in MS. amazed the German. The occasion was the production of "Tannhäuser" in Paris. Later, at Bayreuth, Wagner is reported to have toasted Saint-Saëns as the ~~greatest~~ living French composer. In fact, he was apparently much more impressed by the personality of the Frenchman than that individual was by his.

A holiday in the Pyrenees in 1863 was evidently responsible for the inspiration, and much of the atmosphere, of the Trio in F composed in that year.

The tone colour of this Trio bears early evidence of the composer's extreme sensitiveness to his surroundings. He was especially susceptible to the influence of Nature. One finds ample signs of this in his later works.

The Fantaisie, "Africa" (written in Cairo) and the Fifth Pianoforte Concerto, in F, also conceived during one of his many visits to Egypt, are two outstanding examples of the effects of extraneous suggestion upon his creative genius.

In 1864 he again tried, unsuccessfully, to win the Prix de Rome. Academic honours undeniably possess a value in their assessment of technical knowledge; but this incident, relating to the early career of an artist whose art has attained international distinction, serves to emphasise the fact that success in competition is not necessarily any criterion of artistic worth.

Between Bizet, who with Delibes was a fellow-student at the Conservatoire, and Saint-Saëns existed a very sincere and intimate friendship; and Bizet had won the Prix de Rome in 1857.

The two young composers were almost of an age—to be exact Bizet was the junior by three years—and had sympathetic interests. But the theatre was Bizet's congenial environment. The reputation of his brief career rests there; and it reached its culmination in "Carmen," produced at the Opera in the year of his death, 1875.

About the period under consideration (1863-4) Bizet's opera "Les Pécheurs des Perles" had achieved its début. Rather naturally, then, Saint-Saëns' ideas floated opera-wards, and he sketched out the music for the five acts of "Le Timbre d'Argent" in two months. But the opera underwent many changes and received many checks against production before it finally appeared as his second work in this form given publicly. The Franco-German War and the fall of the Second Empire was, perhaps, Fate's unkindest cut, when at length details of production seemed to be in a fair way of running smoothly.

A triumph, of a quasi-academic nature, occurred to him at the competition arranged by the Imperial Government at the International Exhibition of 1867. His cantata, "Les Noces de Prométhée," was adjudged the winner over 100 other entries. Amongst the judges was Berlioz, who was naturally most elated at the success of his young friend.

Rubinstein, who five years earlier had founded the Conservatoire of Music in Petrograd (St. Petersburg then), relinquished his position of director there and came to Paris. He planned a series of concerts, at which he invited Saint-Saëns, whom he had previously met, to officiate as conductor.

Eventually, at the ninth concert of the series, Saint-Saëns appeared as soloist in the first performance of his own Pianoforte Concerto in G minor (No. 2, Op. 22), which he had roughly written out in three weeks' time. The performance, according to his own account, was a somewhat ragged one, perhaps owing to the phenomenal rapidity with which the work had been composed. However, the occasion also served as the first appearance in Paris, as conductor, of the composer's friend, Rubinstein; and the Scherzo, at least, of the new concerto captivated the enthusiasm of the audience.

One finds here another instance of the sound reasoning and adaptability to circumstances which frequently helped the onward course of the artist.

In the desire which Rubinstein expressed to conduct a concert in Paris the opportunity presented itself to the composer of securing an auspicious première for a new work of his own—the concerto—which was already taking shape in his brain, and he worked energetically to complete it in the short time at his disposal.

The spontaneity and freshness of the music, apart from the evergreen popularity of the work with concert-givers thereafter, is against all theory of it having been a "pot-boiling" effort.

This series of concerts was the means of cementing a delightful friendship between the two men, both already famous in the same branches of their art. They also helped to direct public and official attention more insistently to the dawning greatness of the young Frenchman. The seal of official recognition took the form of the Decoration of the Légion d'Honneur.

Anxious for the opinion of Liszt, Saint-Saëns sent a parcel containing some of his works to the master for criticism. Idealism, vivifying as the light and warmth of the sun, irradiated the relationship of Liszt with his fellow-artists and enabled him to give them advice that was helpful because of its complete freedom from thoughts of self.

In a letter dated July 19th, 1869, he expressed his warm appreciation, and helpfully commented upon the Messe Solennelle (Op. 4), composed in 1856; and although his own Mass had been but recently produced, his reply to Saint-Saëns was absolutely free from petty ideas of rivalry. For Liszt such things simply did not exist.

His friendship had about it none of the transitory characteristics of acquaintanceship. Ten years later, for example, he was instrumental in securing the initial performance of "Samson et Dalila" (then called simply "Dalila") at Weimar.

As an outward indication of the admiration which Saint-Saëns felt for Liszt his attempts at the further exploration of the art-form, the Symphonic Poem, which Liszt created, bears evidence.

During the awful days that began with the surrounding of Paris by the Germans, on Sept. 19th, 1870, Saint-Saëns endured much, mentally and physically. Until the terrors of the Commune, in the following March, he became a soldier of the National Guard. The loss, at Buzenal, of his friend Henri Regnault, the painter, of whom he was very fond, was a personal bereavement of the siege. He composed his "Marche Heroïque" and dedicated it to the memory of Regnault.

Regnault was not only a painter of distinction but possessed a fine tenor voice, and had received a musical education at the Conservatoire. He was able, therefore, to take a living interest in the art of his friend, and he was the first interpreter of "Les Mélodies Persanes," composed at the beginning of the war. Saint-Saëns dedicated "Sabre en main" to him.

The friends saw each other for the last time a few days before Buzenal. Regnault, rifle in hand, was starting out for drill practice. He stopped before his easel on which rested an unfinished water colour. At the bottom of the painting was a shapeless mass of colour. By means of his handkerchief, moistened by saliva, he feverishly worked away at this spot with his disengaged hand, and finally there emerged from it the head of a lion, considerably to the awe of Saint-Saëns, who stood by.

Another loss sustained by the composer from amongst his friends was that of the Abbé Deguerry, to whose good offices he was largely indebted for his appointment at the Madeleine. The priest was one of the hostages shot by the Communists.

A reflection of these days exists in the deep emotion and anguish that pervades the Sonata in C minor (No. 1, Op. 32) for violoncello and pianoforte, conceived as an outcome of the experiences undergone by the composer.

The red days of horror that during March 18th to May 29th razed the Tuileries, Hôtel de Ville, and Palais Royal sent Saint-Saëns with other refugees to London, and but for the Commune it is quite probable that the long acquaintance of the master with England, begun then, would have been considerably delayed.

The necessity for his sudden departure interrupted the activities of the new Société Nationale de Musique, which, with M. Romain Bussine, professor of singing at the Conservatoire, he had just formed.

Gounod was also amongst the distinguished refugees who found sanctuary in the English capital, and the two friends of course met.

The distinction of introducing Saint-Saëns to the musical life of the Metropolis, and incidentally of England, belongs to John Ella, under whom, at one of the concerts of the Musical Union, he appeared in London.

The master returned to his own country upon the suppression of the Commune, and entered immediately on a period of great activity, creatively and in concert work.

He renewed his efforts to get "Le Timbre d'Argent" produced, this time at the Opéra-Comique. The then manager, M. Camille du Locle, suggested that while they awaited the return of better days, Saint-Saëns should write a one-act work. He proposed a collaboration with Louis Gallet, a stranger to Saint-Saëns, but of whom du Locle said, "You were made to understand each other."

He judged aright. The two were duly introduced and the friendship of the collaborators proceeded apace, and lasted from that time, 1871, until the death of Gallet from a painful disease, in 1899. In his "Ecole Buissonnière" the composer has thrown considerable light upon that happy collaboration. He alludes to Gallet as "the diligent and chosen companion of my best years, whose support was so dear and precious to me," and : "Outside our work, too, the relationship was delightful. We wrote to each other constantly in both prose and verse; we bombarded each other with sonnets. His letters were sometimes ornamented with water colours, for he drew very well, and one of his joys was to cover white paper with colour."

Oddly enough, Gallet was not Saint-Saëns' collaborator in the opera that has brought him most fame, "Samson et Dalila." That work was really begun in 1870, before he knew Gallet, to a libretto of Ferdinand Lemaire. The first fruits of the collaboration was the one-act opera, "La Princesse Jaune," which marked the operatic début of Saint-Saëns at the Opéra-Comique on June 12th, 1872. It met with only a lukewarm reception, but was revived in later years.

On July 30th, 1874, Saint-Saëns made the first of his appearances at the concerts of the Royal Philharmonic Society in London. On that occasion he played the part for solo instrument in Beethoven's Concerto in G for pianoforte and orchestra, although he had hoped to present one of the three concertos for the pianoforte which he had already written. The directors, at that time, decided upon the Beethoven work. The other soloists were Mlle. Tietjens and Charles Santley.

In 1875 occurred the death of Bizet. The psychical effect of this loss may perhaps be traced in the mood of questioning with which the Fourth Pianoforte Concerto opens, and in the Chorale of the Quartet in B flat, Op. 41.

Victor Hugo was among those who returned to Paris after the fall of the Second Empire, and in due course Saint-Saëns, who had idealised the man from reading his poems, years before, met the hero of his imagination. Contrary to his preconceived idea of the personality of Liszt, which fell far short of the reality when met, the illustrious author made a quite ordinary impression. His reception of the young composer was hearty enough. He came forward to Saint-Saëns, when he was presented, both hands outstretched in greeting and expressions of pleasure upon his lips.

However, there was a fascination about Hugo which encouraged the artist to go to his evening receptions as often as possible, to listen to his polished phraseology and engaging conversation. The intimacy suffered an interruption that lasted for some years. The poet insinuated that he would be pleased if Saint-Saëns would set to music La Esmeralda. The musician in the composer warned him of the impossibility of accomplishing the work creditably, and he affected not to see the hint given by his host; but he did not go near Hugo's house for a long time after that.

Throughout the latter half of his life, work, and still more work, was the narcotic he favoured to heal the wounds that Fate meted out to his affectionate nature.

In May, 1878, a grief of the most poignant description occurred to him. His eldest son, a baby of two and a half years old, fell from a fourth floor window and was killed. The sinister chain of coincidence which often shows in the occurrence of a second or third death in a family circle within a short space of time proved its existence in the case of Saint-Saëns by robbing him, soon after, of his second son, an infant only seven months old.

Even now, one shrinks from meditating upon the acute agony that the doubly-bereaved father must have suffered.

Although his engagement at the Madeleine had terminated during the previous year, and he was free to that extent to leave Paris and seek forgetfulness in foreign travel, he chose instead the panacea of work, and devoted himself to the completion of his third opera, "Étienne Marcel."

Imagine, then, the tremendous strength of will and powers of concentration that made the creation of music to fit the action of the opera possible under the private circumstances of the composer's life. Gaiety, as much as tragedy, called for musical expression. The work cannot be regarded as representative of its creator at his highest level; but the failing is more one of superficiality, a kind of mechanical emotionalism, than of technique or sterility of idea. At the same time one must remember that the opera was a commissioned one, both Gallet and Saint-Saëns having availed themselves of an opportunity that presented itself when Aimè Gros, a friend of the composer, who had lately taken over the management of the Grand Theatre at Lyons, asked him for a work.

In the summer of 1879 he attended the Birmingham Musical Festival for the production of his cantata "The Lyre and the Harp."

The opinion which he afterwards expressed, publicly, in favour of the English as a thoroughly musical nation is doubly interesting. His criticism of the choristers at the Festival reads :—

"Accuracy, precision in time and rhythm, finesse in the lights and shades, charm in the sonority—this wonderful chorus unites everything. If people who sing like this are not musicians, they do exactly what they would do if they were the best musicians in the world."

Considerable courage was necessary in 1879 to make this assertion; and that Saint-Saëns should have done it is eloquent of his sturdy independence of thought, and his steady refusal to accept "made opinions" on any subject. Investigation came more naturally to him, from the days of babyhood when love of exploration manifested itself in the thoughtful depression of the keys of the pianoforte. Thus, indeed, was the child father of the man.

The soundness of the dictum which Saint-Saëns formulated on that remote occasion is borne out to-day by the prominent position which Britain occupies in the musical art of the world.

The composer maintained his devotion to his art with unabated vigour, appearing in the triple rôle of solo pianist, conductor, and composer on the Continent. He also became friendly with the librarian at Buckingham Palace, and was allowed access to the music MSS. there.

In a bundle of harpsichord music of the Sixteenth Century he found a theme which he used ultimately as the basis of his opera, "Henry VIII.," and in the "Coronation March" (Op. 117, written in 1902 for King Edward VII.).

It is probable that the idea of the opera alluded to occurred during the examination of these old MSS. at Buckingham Palace; at any rate, he began to compose the music for it about that time. He was also elected a member of the Institute when Henri Reber died. Reber was a composer whose chamber music was popular during the youth of Saint-Saëns.

This period (about 1881) also included the rapprochement with Victor Hugo, to which the "Hymne à Victor Hugo" was a contributory factor.

In connection with the erection of a statue to the poet, celebrations were planned, including an important one at the Trocadéro. Memories stirred within the composer and he wrote the Hymne. Victor Hugo was somewhat chagrined at the rate at which the subscriptions for the statue came in; the response was not overwhelming enough to suit his ideas, so he had the subscription stopped, and Saint-Saëns regretfully put his composition away.

However, Bruneau père, the father of Alfred Bruneau, the composer, planned a series of spring concerts at the Trocadéro and went to Saint-Saëns for an unpublished work, and the Hymne came forth from its seclusion.

The whole thing was a tremendous success. The audience applauded the poet (who seldom made a public appearance) vociferously, and he, in turn, fêted and elated, extended the olive branch to his estranged friend, who took it eagerly. The friendship was thus resumed and lasted until the death of the poet in 1885.

The somewhat feverish existence, professional and private, upon which the composer had entered continued until the spring of 1883, when he learnt the lesson that the human machine, especially when it happens to be a highly specialised mechanism like his was, sooner or later reaches a condition that imperatively calls for rest to avoid the snapping of some vital part, weakened to breaking point, by the heat of the tension generated by long and high productivity.

Soon after the first performance of "Henry VIII.," on March 5th, 1883, therefore, he followed the advice of his doctor and sought rest and rejuvenation in sunny Algeria. He completed the cure at Cauterets before returning, in October, to his busy life in Paris. "Henry VIII." was announced at the Opéra, and "Étienne Marcel" at the Théâtre du Château d'Eau.

Liszt had given the first performance of "Samson et Dalila" at Weimar, and its immediate success there was followed by others in the chief centres of music in Germany. All this helped in the consolidation of Saint-Saëns' reputation as a composer of Opéra Grand.

Soon after the production of "Samson" he used his influence to get a work of Massenet's, who was a contemporary and a rival of that period, performed at Weimar. He was therefore greatly hurt by the icy reception given him in private by Massenet when he received the news that his work had also been staged at Weimar. Poor Saint-Saëns had, quite naturally, expected at least the show of friendship which Massenet did not scruple to shower upon him in public.

A request from the Royal Philharmonic Society of London, for a new symphony, arrived at an opportune time for the return of the composer's physical health and vigour. His response to the invitation took the form of the Third Symphony in C minor, which was produced at a concert of the Society on May 19th, 1886, and in Paris on the 9th and 16th of the January following by the orchestra of the Société des Concerts.

The master himself conducted the London performance, and he dedicated the work to Liszt. The death of Liszt occurred, as we know, in July of that year, and the inscription on the published score therefore reads, "to the memory of Franz Liszt."

The exceptional powers, as a symphonist, revealed in this work, occasions regret, in the interests of the development of musical art, that Saint-Saëns did not expend more energy in the writing of symphonies and less upon opera, an art form which was not his most congenial expressive medium.

He left five symphonies and thirteen stage works (ominous number !). One cannot imagine a diminution—probably the reverse—in the total success of his artistic career had these proportions been more equal, or even made vice-versa. The explanation of the actual state of affairs may lie in the commonsense view, that although it is more difficult to secure the production of an opera than of a symphony, the opera, unless it absolutely fails, is likely to attain the greater number of performances right off. On the other hand, a symphony, with its one or two performances during the first month of its existence, as against the half-dozen performances of a moderately-successful opera before it is taken off, would involve very much less financial support.

In 1887 he made another notable appearance in London at a concert organised by the late Mr. Wilhelm Ganz, at which he played the part for solo pianoforte in his Fourth Concerto for that instrument and orchestra.

The cosmopolitan love of travel and change increased in Saint-Saëns with the passage of years. Early in 1890 he left Paris upon a journey to the Canaries. There he laid aside his art and enjoyed a delightful rest from the strain of public life. He adopted another name, and did not leave any address to which letters could be forwarded.

To this period of voluntary obscurity one of his literary works, the "Rimes Familières," probably belongs.

The rest, physical, emotional and mental, which he sought was ended, after a few delightful months incognito, by his recognition in Las Palmas. When once his identity was noised abroad peace was at an end for the recluse. He said, pathetically, that crowds of well-intentioned people invaded his life and rendered it unendurable. The lot of a celebrity in a city is bad enough, but the lot of a celebrity in a small town is robbed of all privacy. And as life in Paris presented greater possibilities of seclusion then, than a continuance of life in Las Palmas, to Paris he returned: at least, for a time.

However, in the winter of 1891, he went to Ceylon, and on the journey home tarried at Cairo where the Fantasia, "Africa," for piano and orchestra, was composed. The work is one of the most popular of all he has written for that combination. It positively exhales the heat-haze and brilliance of Egyptian days and the mysterious spirit of the sparkling starlight in the deep blue dome of clear, cold nights beside the Nile.

The Fantasia is an arresting example of the inherent ability of Saint-Saëns to translate the very atmosphere of his surroundings into terms of music; to transfigure his material circumstances, and his emotions, so that they are intuitively sensed in the imagination of his hearers.

Another visit to his native land was succeeded by a sojourn in Algiers. He wrote a comedy, "La Crampe des Ecrivains" (one act), which was produced at the Municipal Theatre.

On New Year's Day, 1893, he appeared in London at a concert of the Philharmonic Society as soloist in his Concerto No. 2 in G minor for piano and orchestra, and also conducted the performance of his Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," while Tschai-kowsky conducted his Fourth Symphony in F. The occasion was certainly unique in the London concert world.

Saint-Saëns was very delighted with the cordial reception given to him at Cambridge in the following June, and with the hospitality extended to him during his stay in that town. The Honorary Degree of Doctor of Music was conferred upon him then, and also upon Max Bruch, Tschaikowsky, Boïto, and Greig. The Norwegian master was unable to be present, and of the others all, like him, ultimately predeceased the French composer. He was the soloist in a performance of his new Fantasia, "Africa," which provided one of the items at a concert arranged on that occasion.

Now almost as restless as any globe-trotter, he next visited Saigong, in the Far East. The spirit of exploration and discovery animated him rather than the vulgar boastfulness that urges your more mundane traveller to journey chiefly because he likes to say "I've been there—and there—and there—!"; and yet who might as well remain at home, so seldom do his excursions appear to extend far beyond the surroundings of his hotel, in the countries visited. The master regarded his travels as a means of still further extending his knowledge of the human race and of enriching his art by the variety of his experiences.

He was composing all the time. Sometimes new works of magnitude, sometimes altering others that he considered unsatisfactory. In one case (while in the East) completing the score of an opera "Frédégonde," left unfinished by a friend of his old student days, Ernest Guiraud, who had died. Memories of the days when he, Bizet, Guiraud, and Delibes were fellow-students and companions must have crowded upon him as he worked at his dutiful task, in surroundings differing vastly from those conjured by memory.

Another performance of his Symphony No. 3 in C minor was given in London at the Philharmonic on June 7th, 1895, under his direction, with Mr. W. S. Hoyte at the organ and Mr. Henry Bird and Dr. Norman Cummings at the two pianofortes; and a Jubilee Concert was given in Paris the following year to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of his official début into professional musical life at the Sallé Pleyel on May 6th, 1846.

M. Castlebon de Beauxhostes, an amateur musician of considerable wealth, conceived the idea of arranging open-air theatrical performances with music in some arenas at Beziers, in Southern France. The arenas were originally intended to accommodate bull-fighting exhibitions.

Saint-Saëns, ever versatile and adaptable in the employment of his musical gifts and knowledge, undertook to supply an important musical setting for a tragedy written by his friend, Louis Gallet, entitled "Déjanire." As a result of the project came the highly-successful performance at the production in August, 1898.

The composer was in command of the orchestra and a large chorus of male and female voices. The material of this production, musical and literary, it is worth remembering, formed the nucleus of the opera of the same name that was given at Monte Carlo almost thirteen years later (14.3.1911) and at the Opera, Paris, on 22.11.1911.

Gallet, seriously ill, in fact dying, journeyed to Beziers in 1899 for the second production of "Déjanire." His condition of exhaustion, which aggravated the deafness from which he suffered, made it impossible for him to hear anything, not even the plaudits of the thousands of spectators. He died soon afterwards.

In the winter after the première of "Déjanire," Saint-Saëns again visited the Canary Islands, and then proceeded to Buenos Aires to give a series of chamber concerts. Within a few months, however, he returned to Europe and appeared at concerts in Brussels with Ysaÿe, to whom the string quartet No. 1, Op. 112, is dedicated.

At the Paris Exhibition in May, 1900, his cantata, "Le Feu Céleste," was produced at the opening concert. The succeeding five years saw the birth of three new operas, and the incidental music to Mme. Jane Dieulafoy's "Parysatis," some numbers from which, such as the "Air du Rossignol," are frequently heard in concert halls here. For one of the operas alluded to, "Hélène," he was his own librettist. It was produced at Monte Carlo on February 18th, 1904, eleven months later at the Opéra-Comique, and afterwards at Covent Garden, with Melba in the title-rôle.

A trip to the United States, undertaken to keep engagements in Philadelphia, Chicago, and Washington, was physically an unpleasant experience. He became very ill on the journey, and was really unwell until he proceeded to Cairo to recuperate. Despite all this, however, his capacity for finding variety and enjoyment in life and in his surroundings enabled him to derive considerable pleasure from the American tour. He was well received by the Americans, and his impressions of them were most agreeable. Gratitude for his recovery from the illness of this period found expression in a setting of "Praise ye the Lord."

Most celebrities have statues erected to their memory after death; but Saint-Saëns had the somewhat unique experience of being present at the unveiling of a statue of himself erected at Dieppe, where is also the Musée de Saint-Saëns, in 1907.

The veteran violoncellist, Joseph Hollman, gave a concert in Queen's Hall on June 1910, to celebrate the 25th anniversary of his first appearance in England of Saint-Saëns. The programme was devoted to the works of the composer, and was as follows:—Quartet for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello (Op. 41), in which the artists were the composer, Ysaye, Hollander, and Hollman. This was followed by three songs, "La Cloche," "Le bonheur est chose légère," and "Aimons-nous," sung by Miss Esta d'Argo. These were succeeded by what was then a new work, "La Muse et le Poète," specially composed for the occasion, said to have been suggested by de Musset's "La Nuit d'Octobre," and performed by Ysaÿe and Hollman, with the master in charge of the pianoforte arrangement of the orchestral score, in which form the work was published soon after. Roul Pugno joined Saint-Saëns in a performance of the Scherzo for two pianofortes (Op. 87), and the concert concluded with the Septet for pianoforte, two violins, viola, violoncello, double-bass, and trumpet (Op. 65). The programme was therefore briefly representative of the art of the composer from 1875 until the date of the occasion.

In 1912 Saint-Saëns was invited by the General Association of German Musicians, which Liszt had founded fifty years earlier, to take part in the Liszt Centenary celebrations at Heidelberg. He accepted the invitation reluctantly. The Society admits foreigners to its membership, and years before Liszt had nominated Saint-Saëns to the membership in succession to Berlioz. There was some disagreement between the Society and their new French member, and he only accepted their invitation to participate in the celebrations because he feared that a refusal would be attributed to entirely wrong motives. He really did not enjoy the idea of appearing, at his advanced age, beside such masters as Rösler, Busoni, and Friedheim well in the zenith of their powers,

In the summer and autumn of 1913 Saint-Saëns appeared again in England. The first occasion was at Queen's Hall on June 2nd, at a Festival held in commemoration of the 75th year of his musical life, dating from the time when as a baby of two and a half years old he first experimented at the keyboard. The second appearance alluded to occurred at the Gloucester Festival, which he attended for the production of his last oratorio, "The Promised Land," written in that year.

The programme at the Festival Concert in Queen's Hall was devoted to the works of Saint-Saëns, save for a Concerto of Mozart, in which, in preference to any of his own, the master chose to appear as a soloist on the piano.

Perhaps the choice of the concerto was influenced by memories of his first concert appearance at the Sallé Pleyel. We have, on this, no definite information; but the mere fact points to a sentiment of the kind. What thoughts the event must have awakened in the mind of the aged musician!

A lifetime in the service of Art! Crowned with honour, and still juvenile and undaunted in spirit, despite the weight of years!!

The principal item from his own pen was the Symphony in C minor.

Mr. Hermann Klein presented an album, containing the signatures of prominent personages in musical life in London. And the occasion was also dignified by the reading of an appreciative address by Sir Alexander Mackenzie.

During the Great War the patriotism of the master found outlet in the publication of a small book, entitled "Germanophile" (1916), in which he deals, from the musicians' point of view, with German influence in France at that time. In 1919 the "Marche Interalliée," Op. 155, was written; and other lesser compositions of patriotic kind, as detailed in the Appendix.

In October of the following year he appeared as composer and executant at a concert in the Trocadéro, Paris, arousing his audience to a pitch of tremendous enthusiasm. The allurements of the warmth and sunshine of Algiers, but forty-eight hours' journey distant, made its irresistible appeal, and he wintered there and incidentally achieved more concert successes.

In the autumn of 1921 we again find this marvellous old man once more in Paris, superintending rehearsals of a gala performance of "Ascanio" personally. On the night of the public performance, however, at his request, Reynaldo Hahn wielded the bâton.

A friend who met the composer about this time, in Paris, informs me that despite his great age he was still practising for two hours daily at the pianoforte, Again he went to Algiers, and there, on December 4th, 1921, his death occurred at the age of eighty-six years and two months.

The interment took place in Paris, although there was, at first, a suggestion for a public funeral, with military honours, at Algiers.

To this great age, then, attained the baby whose chances of survival, as the offspring of a consumptive father, at the outset appeared remote, and whose energy and achievements during an unusually long and extraordinarily strenuous life would have done credit to a Hercules.

PART II

THEME I

ARTISTIC POWERS AND OUTLOOK

Commentators, from Gounod to the present day, have made a good deal of the versatility of Saint-Saëns; but why versatility should be instanced as an outstanding sign of genius is a little difficult to apprehend. Versatility is more commonly a possession of the mediocre individual.

Saint-Saëns became great because of his inherent genius, which a thoroughly sound musical education, and the well-balanced outlook upon life instilled into him by his natural guardians, enabled him to express to the full. Circumstances, including the busy, inescapable change, variety, and travel of a concert artist's life, allied to the wit and common-sense of a highly-developed intelligence, and his inherent fondness for proving things for himself, resulted in the versatility that brought such wide-spread fame during his lifetime.

His most individual works belong to the realm of absolute music. Of such are the Symphony in C minor, the Trio in F, the Sonata in C minor for violoncello and pianoforte, the Concerto in A minor for 'cello and orchestra, and the 2nd and 4th Concertos for pianoforte and orchestra. They have their root in psychological condition, and represent his greatness as an artist. The very much larger output concerned with programme music in varying phases is representative of his extraordinary abilities as a musician: and over the works belonging to both classifications is found his sensitive feeling for tonal colour, and his rhythmic and melodic fertility which are as the imprint of his genius.

It is this feeling of colour, not always expressed by original methods, but unfailingly correct, that drapes his lesser creations with a shimmering garment of illusion which blinds us, perhaps, to the commonplaceness of an accompaniment figure; and it is the same quality which irradiates his more erudite, and enduring, inspirations with a light that makes them comprehensible and appealing to the musically untaught. His manner is classical, but not obtuse.

Herein lies the explanation of the wide appeal made by his music. It can be equally attractive to a "Prom." audience or to that at the Royal Philharmonic Society's concerts. From this also is fashioned the expanse of the target presented by the Art of Camille Saint-Saëns to the relentless slings of the Philistines, when they are minded to engage in punitive attacks upon the weak points commonly existent over an extensive front.

This square-set man of middle height, self-possessed, and confident in bearing, with a somewhat large nose, wonderfully bright eyes, and clear, penetrating speaking voice, was manifestly a strong personality. Native politeness and good breeding proclaimed their presence in his conduct towards others. He had the perfect naturalness and simplicity of manners that are usually found in the truly great. His intellectual powers were under full control, and his memory was perfect. Few incidents in the course of his public life could destroy his self-possession and determination to carry through his engagements.

On one occasion a fall through a trap door injured his back, but the accident did not prevent him from keeping a promise to play in an eight-handed arrangement for piano of his "Marche Héroïque," although the pain he suffered prevented him from bending in acknowledgment of the applause.

Travel and extensive reading, allied to his active intelligence, and a sparkling, witty style of speech, made him a brilliant and fascinating conversationalist.

He enjoyed a discussion; and he enjoyed it more keenly, if possible, on paper than verbatim, although it is credible that the latter mode of expression provided greater entertainment for his hearers, and gave less quarter to his adversary.

Saint-Saëns' complete mastery of the technique of his art placed the whole gamut of emotional expression, via music, under his control. Occasionally one encounters patches of exotic colour in his scores that are blended into the prevailing scheme with a skill that unifies them to it, like a thicket of rhododendrons blooming in semi-wild luxuriance amid sombre conifers in a Scottish Highland glen.

Early in his career he cultivated adaptability in method of expression. To quote Gounod, "he could write at will in the style of Rossini, Verdi, Schumann or Wagner. He is a musician armed with every weapon; he knows the masters by heart."

Thus, when fondness and the necessity for travel augmented the storehouse of his imagination, and increased the supply of tints upon his palette, he was technically able to transmute extraneous experiences into the fabric, emotionally, of his art.

When he restricted himself to purely programme music, to music in which the emotional appeal is secondary to the imitative suggestion of sounds of nature, or even of machinery (see analysis of 5th Pianoforte Concerto), or to suggest exotic folk-song idiom, or national characteristics (see analysis of "Africa" and the Quartet for strings, Op. 112), it was his custom to work amid the surroundings, in the very locality even, that he desired to portray, musically.

When composing the majority of his works, Saint-Saëns apparently wrote ahead pretty steadily until the construction was ended. Sometimes, however, the idea and general outlines of a work were completed, mentally, before he jotted down a note of it. Other works would be constructed from a series of sketches, briefly noted in inspired moments. This latter plan is, of course, a favourite one with many composers; but evidently Saint-Saëns was less addicted to the sketch-book habit than, say, Beethoven. He seldom revised his larger works. Probably this explains the spontaneity that pervades his music, although his facility of technical resource sometimes endangers the naïveté of his melodic flow. He was no doubt wise in refraining from the meticulous polishing-up which brushes off the pristine bloom from much creative art. We may deduce the wisdom of this course from the comparative obscurity to-day of three of his operas that were re-written efforts, "Le Timbre d'Argent," "Proserpine," and "Déjanire,"—the last pieced up from the tragedy of the same name by Louis Gallet, to which he wrote the music. In "Déjanire," by the way, he makes use of a theme, to denote the hero, Hercules, that is utilised for the same purpose in his symphonic poem, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule."

Liszt influenced the creative art of Saint-Saëns very largely. His influence spreads beyond the sphere of the symphonic poems, which are not markedly Lisztean in manner, and it began more than a dozen years before the first symphonic poem was written. There is evidence of it in the First Concerto for piano-forte and orchestra; evidence that is curiously juxtapositioned with mannerisms obviously the outcome of reading Mozart and Beethoven.

Liszt's influence is still more noticeable in the symphonic poem, "Danse Macabre," and in the last of the piano concertos, although, considered as a whole, that work is thoroughly representative of Saint-Saëns' style in programme music.

The cyclic plan of construction is another sign of Liszt's ideas that appears pretty constantly throughout the bigger works and the chamber music of Saint-Saëns. This was not, of course, a characteristic of Liszt alone. César Franck, a contemporary of both Liszt and Saint-Saëns, was greatly attracted by the plan. There is a curious affinity in emotional content, and in structural idea, although not otherwise, between the Third Symphony, in C minor, of Saint-Saëns, and that in D of César Franck. Both are immortal works, and both were given to the world about the same time—1886 and 1889. The kinship of their mood provokes thought as to what may be the source of artistic inspiration, apart from music that owes its being to programmatic suggestion. It is unlikely that Franck plagiarised the idea of Saint-Saëns' symphony when writing his own work.

The Fifth Piano Concerto, and the Fantasia "Africa," of Saint-Saëns are conspicuous examples of their creator's power of suggesting his sound-picture by means of faint outlines and sensitive colouring, rather than by the sharp prints of direct sound photography.

He does not dispense with the latter method, however. There are early indications of it in "Phaëton," in the figure indicative of the impatience of the steeds, and there is more than a hint of it in the next symphonic poem, "Danse Macabre," in which the craftsmanship approaches the crude realism of Schöenberg and Stravinsky, both outstanding figures of to-day in the further development of this special phase of the art of music.

Saint-Saëns was, however, happiest and most successful when concerned with subtle hints of "atmosphere" in his programme music.

Consider, for example, the clever suggestion of space, which is as invisible, and yet on occasion as impressive, as music, that he manages at the outset in "Le Rouet d'Omphale." A simple device of instrumentation creates the effect. The tone of muted violins, and flutes, playing alternate bars of the figure employed, in conjunction with an abrupt change of key each time, produces the peculiar tonal colour at the beginning of the poem. Similar methods are employed in "Phaéton"; in the second part of the Third Symphony in C minor—although the application there is psychological; in the accompaniment of the song, sung by Katherine in scene 1 of the final act in "Henry VIII."; in the symphonic description of the flood in "Le Déluge"; and in the last number of "The Promised Land." Further allusion will be found in Part III. of this book to other instances of this characteristic of the composer's methods.

Undoubtedly the artistic tenets of Berlioz and Gounod became absorbed in the make-up of their young protégé, much as marked Beethoven and Mozart traits, observable in his earlier works, were submerged in his mature art.

A mannerism, partly of Liszt and partly of Chopin, sometimes obtrudes in the piano concertos. A broad melody in octaves, for right hand, may be accompanied by flowing arpeggi for left hand, with, or without, orchestral support. Typical examples of this occur in the second movement of the Fifth Piano Concerto, in the first movement of the Second Piano Concerto, and in the First Sonata for violoncello and piano.

Saint-Saëns was most certainly unaware of any inheritance from Chopin—if it is an inheritance, and not merely a coincidence. Possibly a similarity in the nature of both (although there is little external indication of it) explains the unkind implications upon Chopin, as pianist and composer, which Saint-Saëns occasionally made.

In "Au Courant de la Vie," he tells of a dog that was fond of music, and would curl itself up, under the legs, or beside the feet, of the pianist; but that after hearing eight bars or so of any piece by Chopin the animal would get up and leave the room, with its tail between its legs!

Similarities do not invariably attract. They repel rather, when they exist between the work of two artists, especially creative artists. Saint-Saëns himself noted that circumstance in the relationship of Auber and Massenet, and it partly explained the attitude of Massenet towards Saint-Saëns.

Saint-Saëns often began his themes on the middle or last beat in the bar, and the dotted, and double-dotted, note is a characteristic of his melodic line. It appears at the beginning of his First and Second Symphonies, in the Violin Concerto in B minor, and in the First and Second Quartets for Strings—to quote a few instances extending over the many years of his productivity. In the chamber music in particular this type of melody has often the artless lilt of a folk-song.

On the other hand, he has written a few melodies that have been inevitably harmonised à la chorale, as in the noble theme towards the close of Part I. of the Third Symphony. They are a complete contrast in style to his more usual manner.

When concerned with a libretto, or a definite programme, his expression has naturally been governed by extraneous suggestion, and sometimes, as in the Suite Algérienne, the extreme slightness of the thematic material does not expand beyond a melodic figure of three or four notes, often remarkably apt in suggestion.

The music of Saint-Saëns is strongly rhythmic. His independence in this characteristic has progressed consistently, until, in his middle and later periods, we find changes of time-signature, in alternate bars, or as interpolations, wherever the composer insistently felt their need.

An early indication of rhythmic freedom occurs in the Third Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. The tendency is more strongly marked in "Henry VIII.," and in Part II. of the Third Symphony, where a really remarkable effect is brought about as detailed in my analysis of that work.

This intuitive anticipation of the tendency towards plastic rhythms, which is a characteristic of the most recent music of European nations, is an index to the genius of Saint-Saëns.

A survey of the life-work of this remarkable man leads to the conclusion that in colour and rhythm his influence will be far-reaching in the musical art of the future. In these two directions he bridges the past with the present. His unusually long life and great productivity led to the unusual circumstance of the development of his genius during his lifetime. He did not belong to the pathetic band of pioneers, in the history of the arts and sciences, whose mortal span fell short of the length of their spiritual missions, and whose ideas have consequently had to be completed by other minds.

Saint-Saëns has not created any new form; but under his art, symphony, symphonic poem, concerto, opera, and oratorio progressed. The ability to subtly mirror emotional condition exists to an uncommon degree in his symphonic writing, and in his chamber music, and upon this structural foundation it is conceivable that a new form may be built by a successor.

The master's outlook upon the progress of musical art was somewhat bounded by the sun-down of his own day. He expressed the view that one might get accustomed to anything, even to bad habits, and unprepared, and unresolved, dissonances, which he likened to them.

This view was hardly charitable, and certainly lacked the breadth of outlook with which he regarded most things. In expressing himself thus, Saint-Saëns evidently overlooked the fact that his own music, to say nothing of that of some of his precursors, would probably have sounded far from agreeable to the ears of Monteverde or Palestrina, who by their use or "invention" of the chord of the dominant seventh laid the foundations of the harmonic structure developed by their successors, including Saint-Saëns.

While holding no brief for the prophets of noise, as an art (?)—its place in science I do not question—one cannot ignore logic in considering the progress of musical art. One must listen to the results of the experiments in sound, rhythm, and polyphony, with a perfectly open mind. If the experimenters achieve their aims, they are surely worthy of commendation, whether or not their ideas call forth one's personal admiration.

Unfortunately, some ultra-modern composers appear to have no definite goal, if, indeed, they are aware of any at all. This indecision, like the frank sensationalism of others, probably caused Saint-Saëns to allude to their efforts in the manner that he did, for he was usually lenient, and often illuminating, in his appreciation of the art of the contemporaries of his younger days.

His criticisms compel admiration by their cool logic and detachment from any bias of sentiment. His attitude, therefore, to many of those who, as he said, were not of his day, may be explained by the superficiality of some modern music.

Berlioz, as we have seen, was one of the friends of his youthful years, a friend for whom he had a deep admiration and affection. He was under no illusions over what he regarded as the older master's failings as a composer. He compares the effect of the thirty-eight trumpets and trombones which Berlioz uses in his "Requiem," with the manner in which Mozart cleverly suggests, with only one trombone, a similar idea; and he points out that Berlioz, like Beethoven, had little regard for the peculiar needs of the human voice, treating it merely as a man-made instrument. At the same time, he directs attention to the Olympian grandeur of conception in the Berlioz work.

In the judgment of Saint-Saëns, Meyerbeer, who died when the young composer was 29 years old, was a greater musician than an artist. The famous Frenchified Berliner's posthumous "L'Africaine" was patched together by Fétis, Perrin, and du Locle, and produced long before Saint-Saëns had made any operatic venture.

Meyerbeer's love of polish spoilt the appeal of much of his work. His fondness for creating all possible publicity in advance of the production of a new work, by announcing it long before completion, or by delaying the production on one pretext or another, certainly denoted a genius for Nineteenth Century advertising methods.

Saint-Saëns regarded Meyerbeer as an important agent in the progress of opera. He heralded the dawn of the leit-motif in "Robert le Diable," and at that early date (1831) also, and in "Les Huguenots," he substituted the short, distinctive prélude for the long overture.

The besetting weakness of Meyerbeer appears to have been his susceptibility to the suggestion of others, which sometimes led to the reconstruction almost of an entire opera, fashioned after the ideas of various friends.

Whether a desire for passing fame and success, or a sincere wish to perfect his work, was at the root of Meyerbeer's operatic vacillations does not concern us here. The weakness has helped to consign his work to the oblivion that is its condition to-day. Saint-Saëns expressed the charitable view of the matter.

Towards Offenbach, Saint-Saëns felt the indulgence, not unmixed with irritation, that the master-craftsman inevitably feels for the apprentice.

Offenbach's practically inexhaustible fund of pleasing melodies, and his instinctive harmonic sense, which sometimes had surprising results—as in “Daphnis et Chloé,” where exists an early instance of the dominant eleventh—drew the commendation of Saint-Saëns. But of the amazing numerical assemblage of seventy operas left by this German Jew, who installed himself in Paris two years before the birth of Saint-Saëns, and remained there until he died in 1880, we hear nothing to-day save “Les Contés d'Hoffmann” and (lately) “The Goldsmith of Toledo”—both posthumous productions. And the former opera was finished, and corrected, by Guiraud.

The appreciation of Saint-Saëns for the genius of Liszt was whole-hearted. At a time when the art of the great pianist-composer was unpopular in Paris, he exerted himself energetically to combat the derogatory influence. He organised an orchestral concert in the Théâtre Italien, and produced the Dante Symphony, and the Andante from the Faust Symphony. He was greatly impressed by the beauty of the oratorio “Christus,” which he heard for the first time at Heidelberg. Although he had previously gained a very high impression of the oratorio from reading the score, its many fine qualities, of conception and technique, were revealed, when actually heard, to an extent that far exceeded his expectations.

The skilled use which Liszt makes in this mighty work of the human voice in all shades of colour, from the voices of young children to the most sonorous timbre of the adult male, excited the admiration of the French master as much as the orchestral ensemble. He realised, however, that occasionally Liszt appeared to over-estimate the significance of certain quite ordinary chordal sequences in some of his instrumental works.

Liszt's sensitive temperamental endowment, which gave an unapproachable distinction to his executive art, probably led to the errors of judgment, as a creative artist, noted by Saint-Saëns. If Liszt had curbed his theatricality (supposing that he could have been conscious of it, himself), his critics of to-day would have had greater cause for their accusations of artificiality.

The conceptive greatness of the Sonata in B minor, which has probably had more slighting references made about it than any other pianoforte composition of importance performed regularly in our time, was very real to Saint-Saëns. Like a skilful physician, confronted by a mysterious malady, he diagnosed the cause, of this general lack of appreciation, without effort. In his opinion, the technical, or emotional, insufficiency of many of the concert pianists who essay the interpretation of the Sonata causes its subtleties to remain hidden, and brings about the misconception of the public. The combined qualities of a great artist, and of a great virtuoso, as well as an appreciation of Liszt's style, are indispensable for the presentation of the work.

Saint-Saëns admired greatly the facility of Massenet in orchestrating his works, for Massenet was able to turn out page after page of orchestration with little apparent effort; and the gracefulness, and prevalent gaiety of it, also attracted him.

He envied the success that followed Massenet's nice judgment of the taste and sympathies of his operatic public. This power amounted to an extra sense in Jules Massenet. He possessed it in greater degree than Saint-Saëns, who was the greater artist of the two.

One of the penalties imposed upon those born during the present phase of civilisation is the constant misunderstanding of the purest motives, to which the prevalence of sophistry, and the religion of self-seeking, leads.

At heart Massenet apparently regarded Saint-Saëns' friendly advances with suspicion, and in a spirit of professional rivalry. Each publicly acclaimed his admiration for the other, but fear of a private friendship being turned to professional uses, hindered any real intimacy. Their relationship was thus interesting, but pathetic.

In contrast to this sad picture of the devastating results which the conventional outlook may breed, we have one of the very charming, and trustful, friendship that existed between Saint-Saëns and Bizet.

They were fellow-students, striving together to gain the public ear in the same profession; fellow-confidants of each other's hopes, joys, and sorrows; and mutual judges, and encouragers, of each other's art. The picture, limited in scope by the tragically early death of Bizet, became as an exquisite memory to Saint-Saëns.

Happy also was the relationship of Saint-Saëns with Delibés, who was a year his junior, and who eventually became a director of the Opéra, and a professor at the Conservatoire—Delibés, who longed to write grand opera, and who had to content himself with writing ballets. Saint-Saëns regarded his "Coppélia" as a marvellous work.

Ernest Guiraud, another member of this early quartet of student friends, also developed as a composer of opera, and taught composition at the Conservatoire. Saint-Saëns held him in much esteem, and affection, and he was responsible for the piano scores of several of Saint-Saëns' operas. As related elsewhere, the master undertook the onerous duty of completing Guiraud's opera "Frédégonde," in 1895, in an attempt to add posthumous fame to his name three years after his death.

Saint-Saëns' admiration for Wagner was tempered with a feeling that sometimes the older master tended towards harmonic excesses; but in the main his praise was unstinted. "Die Meistersinger" and "Die Walküre" called forth his highest eulogiums. Wagner, as recorded in Part I., openly expressed his admiration of Saint-Saëns' superb musicianship, and of his powers as a composer.

Auber and Saint-Saëns were intimately acquainted. The elderly composer (he was fifty-three years the senior of Saint-Saëns) interested himself in his promising young countryman, of whom he was fond. He had considerable influence in Paris and was instrumental in starting Saint-Saëns upon his operatic career. But it is rather odd that Auber did not procure for his young friend a libretto from Scribe, who was the most popular librettist of the day, and the man whose collaboration helped so greatly in the success of Auber's own operas (he wrote over forty), and who also gained distinction with Meyerbeer.

Saint-Saëns had little regard for the music of Brahms, who was two years his senior. He considered that many people mistook the heaviness of Brahms' music for depth; but it is a little surprising that the Hamburger's chamber works did not appeal to Saint-Saëns' love of academic style in that form of music.

His friendship with Rubinstein, and his meeting with Tschaikowsky (whose music was naturally sympathetic to him) have already been alluded to, like his friendship with Rossini.

It was at the salon of Rossini, in the Chausée d'Antin that Adelina Patti, then lacking in her artistic sense and judgment of later years, incurred the displeasure of the great Italian by taking unwarrantable liberties with the aria from "Le Barbier." She altered it so much in performance, that after complimenting her upon her beautiful voice, Rossini asked her the name of the composer of the aria!

In the opinion of Saint-Saëns, Rossini wrote nothing of value after "Guillaume Tell."

The hostility which forced him to seek the semi-privacy of the life in the appartement in the Chausée d'Antin stopped the flow of adulation, which was so necessary to make the fountain of his inspiration shoot forth its brilliant jets.

Richard Strauss was forty-eight when Saint-Saëns saw him at Heidelberg, in 1912, at the Liszt Centenary Celebrations. He formed a high opinion of Strauss' powers as a conductor, and of his possibilities as a force in the evolution of musical art. The most recent examples of Strauss' creative art do not support this prognostication, and his powers as a conductor, to-day, are more adequate than inspired.

Among the pupils of Saint-Saëns attention may be directed to the names of Gabriel Fauré, André Messager, and Arthur de Greef.

To appreciate clearly the part played by Saint-Saëns in the development of musical art, and establish a sense of perspective, it is necessary to recollect that at the time he began his career as a composer, with the symphony dedicated to Seghers, i.e., when he was seventeen years of age, the later string quartets of Beethoven were regarded as revolutionary and more or less unplayable, by Parisian musicians.

PART II

THEME II

SOCIAL LIFE AND OPINIONS

In his own individual manner, and especially in connection with his art, Saint-Saëns found much interest in social life. He had a child-like ability for finding joy and pleasure in simple things that must surely have contributed largely to the preservation of the clarity of intellectual powers, and freshness, which are found even in his latest creative work.

The ability is one that is often present in the personality of genius, and doubtless has its function as a compensating action for the otherwise severe strain to which the nervous system of a highly-specialised human organisation is subjected. When it does not exist, the genius, that is proverbially akin to madness, crosses the border-line. As an example of that kind of catastrophe one recollects the end of Schumann's life, Victor Hugo's decline, and the weakness that is said to have threatened Liszt during the illness which preceded the attack of pneumonia that swiftly gathered him to the sickle of the grim Reaper.

I am indebted to a friend, Mme. Amina Goodwin, the distinguished pianist, for the following incidents which serve to illustrate this youthful trait in the personality of Saint-Saëns. Mme. Amina Goodwin knew the master intimately, and it was through him (as the third incident, published in the "Morning Post" of 27.12.21, shows), that she came to know Liszt. En passant, it is of interest to record that this fine artist also began her professional career when she was a mere child, and that it brought her into association with Brahms, Pugno, and other notabilities in the musical world.

I quote the incidents just as related by my informant :

"M. Léon Glaize, a well-known portrait painter of Lille, was a great friend of Saint-Saëns, from the time when they were both very young. They used to have weekly 'Musical Evenings' with Pugno (the great pianist), in Glaize's painting studio. These were very merry evenings for all concerned.

"Saint-Saëns improvised the music of a comedy, called 'La Blouse et l'Habit,' or, 'Le fils de la Revolution.' There was a flood, and a fire, in this play, and the music was most descriptive of these exciting disasters. The words were written by Paul Ferrier, in conjunction with Paul Devoulède.

“ Mme. Glaize, the mother of the painter, was also a friend of Saint-Saëns’ dear old mother. Glaize painted the portrait of Saint-Saëns, life size, and it was greatly admired in the Salon of Paris, 1899. This portrait now hangs in the Maison Erard, in Paris.

“ At a great festival, in the North of France, given in honour of Camille Saint-Saëns, the President naturally begged the composer to be present at the big dinner given on the occasion. Saint-Saëns replied that to his great regret he could not possibly dine out, having to follow a very strict diet. The President assured him that he could be served with whatever dish he wanted. The composer then explained that the doctor had ordered him to eat the glutinous, and nutritious, part of pigs’ feet. ‘All right!’ replied the President, ‘You shall have pigs’ feet!’

“ The day of the banquet, which was a very sumptuous affair, arrived, and Saint-Saëns was served with the much-discussed dish of pigs’ feet. As the composer was a bit of a gourmet, and always enjoyed a good dinner, he was sorely tempted by all the delicious courses handed round, but did not dare touch any rich food. At last he could stand it no longer, and there was a marked crescendo in his temper as he battled with the dish of pigs’ feet. Having finished it, he suddenly rose from the table, flushed with anger, and in spite of the protestations, and prayers, of the President and the other guests, insisted upon leaving the banquet, notwithstanding the fact that the whole affair had been given in the composer's honour." (This incident is very typical of Saint-Saëns' impulsive, and child-like nature.)

From "The Morning Post," 27.12.21:—

"Miss Amina Goodwin, the well-known founder of the London Trio, writes concerning her memory of Camille Saint-Saëns in the following terms:—

"Although a considerable amount of musical matter and appreciation has been written the last few days about the late eminent composer, Saint-Saëns, a few lines of personal remembrance of the man may not be without interest. The first thing that struck me was his devotion to his mother, which was very beautiful.

"When I went to his house in Paris, as a child (having won a scholarship at the Paris Conservatoire), he would not let me leave, after playing to him one of his piano works, until he had taken me into another room to see his dear mother, to whom he told all the details of my visit.

"Saint-Saëns was ever ready to give a helping hand to his colleagues, and was deeply appreciative to artists who interpreted his music to his satisfaction. When I expressed a timid wish for a few lines to his friend Liszt, before going to Weimar, the kindest letter was at once forthcoming.

“ ‘After Liszt had read it he came forward, exclaiming, “Ah! Mon cher Saint-Saëns,” and greeted me with the same warmth and affection as his thoughts for his great friend and admirer evoked.

“ ‘On one occasion, after a slight misunderstanding, his impatience caused me to dissolve into tears. He at once patted my head and apologised for his hastiness. His disposition was impulsive to a degree, but he had a great sense of humour and wit.

“ ‘He was highly amused one day at Broadwood’s (then in Great Pulteney Street), where he came to hear me rehearse his well-known “Variations for two pianos” on a theme of Beethoven, which I was going to play, with Max Pauer, at a recital for two pianos. When he saw the enormous height of Max Pauer standing next to “little me,” his amusement was intense. Saint-Saëns exclaimed “That will not do,” and lifted me on to a chair, which, as I stood on it, brought my head to the same level as that of Max. “Voilà, c’est mieux, now you are as tall as your colleague.”

“ ‘Truly, Saint-Saëns had a charming and child-like nature, allied to deep sincerity and depth of character.’ ”

The charm of manner which attracted the friendship of so many famous artists to Saint-Saëns made him a favourite with the many Royal personages with whom he came into touch. To mention the Royalties of the 'eighties and 'nineties whom Saint-Saëns did not meet would be simpler than to relate anecdotes, and refer to all those whom he knew. In his "École Buissonnière" he relates his experiences in the inimitable fashion that is distinctively his. The following anecdotes are abridgements therefrom :

He was received in audience twice by Queen Victoria at Windsor Castle. On the first of these occasions he was presented by a friend, the Baroness de Caters, who was, at that time, giving lessons in singing to the Princess Beatrice, then a bashful young girl.

The audience was an informal one, and when Her late Majesty entered the room she came forward with both hands extended in cordial welcome. Saint-Saëns afterwards played to her upon the organ (in the chapel at Windsor) and upon the piano. Finally, he accompanied the Princess as she sang the aria from "Étienne Marcel."

Queen Victoria was so delighted that some days after, without the composer being told of it, she summoned to Windsor Madame Gye (i.e., Madame Albani-Gye), wife of the manager of Covent Garden, to ask to have "Étienne Marcel" staged at her own theatre. The Queen's wish, for a reason which Saint-Saëns does not state, was not granted.

The second audience was accorded to the composer seventeen years later. The Queen was then unable to walk alone, and Saint-Saëns expresses himself as having felt heart-broken at the change in her appearance. However, once seated at a small table she seemed much as before, excepting for her white hair.

She asked the composer about "Henry VIII.," which was being given for the second time at Covent Garden, and he told her about his manuscript find in the library at Buckingham Palace, and of the use which he had made of the Sixteenth Century air in the opera. Queen Victoria was much interested, and His Highness the Duke of Connaught wrote Saint-Saëns that she spoke of it several times.

Altogether charming is the account given by Saint-Saëns of the audience granted him by Her Majesty Queen Alexandra. She received him along with Joseph Hollman, the violoncellist.

On this occasion Queen Alexandra was in deep mourning for the successive deaths of her parents, the King and Queen of Denmark. She spoke to Saint-Saëns about her mother, whom he had met at Copenhagen with her sisters, the Dowager Empress of Russia, and the Princess of Hanover, and was cordial in her manner. After he had played a duet with Hollman, Queen Alexandra expressed a desire to hear him play alone. As he attempted to lift the lid of the instrument, the Queen stepped forward to help him to raise it before her maids of honour (Lady Gray and the Hereditary Princess of Greece) could intervene. Queen Alexandra afterwards presented to each of the artists, in the name of herself and of His late Majesty King Edward VII., who was absent, a gold medal commemorative of artistic merit, and she offered them a cup of tea which she had herself poured out. The composer's account of the reception gives a delightful picture of the gracious lady who is so dear to the hearts of the British people to-day.

Queen Christine of Spain, who had heard Saint-Saëns play the piano, expressed a desire to hear him play the organ. Arrangements were therefore made for him to play to her in a church, upon a certain day. Some great ladies of the period lectured the indiscreet Queen for daring to resort to a church for any purpose other than that of taking part in Divine Service.

In response, Queen Christine, instead of going privately to the church to hear the master play, attended in great state, with King Alphonso (who was then very young), with the Ministers and the Court, while horsemen, stationed at intervals along the Royal route, blew trumpets!

Saint-Saëns had written a religious march specially for the occasion, and the Queen graciously accepted the dedication. Then she asked him to play "Mon cœur s'ouvre à ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila." While, considerably flustered at the request in such a place, he hurriedly improvised an organ arrangement of the aria, and the Queen listened, with an expression of rapt attention, her elbow on the keyboard and her chin resting on one hand. One can only express the utmost admiration for the independent conduct of the Royal lady.

Queen Amelie of Portugal once honoured the composer by according to him a quite informal reception. She dispensed with all her ladies-in-waiting, for the occasion, which enabled her to have her guest sit in a chair near to her and enjoy a chat upon various topics.

In his account of his friendship with Their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians, whom he first knew when they were heirs-apparent, there is a delightful little incident relating to Queen Elizabeth. One day, in addressing her in conversation, the aged composer forgot, for the moment, her accession in rank, and spoke to her as "Highness"; then, remembering, apologised for his mistake. The Queen replied, with a smile, "Don't apologise," said she, "that recalls good times."

The life of Saint-Saëns is one of unusual interest even for the individual not deeply interested in the art of music, for he met so many interesting people, distinguished in literature, science, and pictorial art during the course of his long life.

The fact that his mother was an amateur painter (apparently she painted chiefly portraits) served to bring him into close contact with many of the leading artists of his day. Some of his mother's pictures are exhibited in the Musée de Saint-Saëns at Dieppe.

Ingres, who is known to the public of this decade by reproductions of his picture, "La Source," was credited with skill as a violinist by popular report; but Saint-Saëns, who knew him intimately from childhood, contradicted any such idea. In reply to a direct enquiry, Ingres informed his young friend, in a vague manner, that he had once played second violin in a string quartet. His opinions on musical art of the period were echoes of the views of Delsarte, and of Henri Reber, and his knowledge of music was not gained, apparently, from practical experience, although his love for the art was unquestionable. According to the composer, Ingres was a rather serious old man, inclined to profundity, and (one suspects) something of a poseur in matters of taste. But he apparently exerted a strong influence, in firing the ambitions of the small boy, at an early age.

Saint-Saëns met Gustave Doré at the salon of Rossini, where he was a frequent visitor, and belonged to the dilletanti who championed the cause of melody and opposed "learned scientific music." The two became friends, visited each other frequently, and discussed questions of the day as well as their own private affairs. Doré finally made the composer the confidant of his innermost thoughts. Apparently jovial and boyish, he was in reality melancholy, and sensitive, lacking in commonsense application of his artistic powers (that could hardly have been otherwise, considering his imaginative qualities) and inclined to attribute the failure of his paintings to prejudice and spite rather than to the fulsome appreciation of the press for his art as a designer. He had a most wonderful memory for visualising detail, and he preferred to rely upon it and disdained the use of models, which was a disastrous plan in the painting of large pictures. Saint-Saëns records having seen Doré engaged upon work on thirty canvasses at a time in his studio.

Doré could play the violin with a certain amount of technical proficiency, and had he worked at acquiring a technique would probably have been a successful artist in that direction also, for he had undoubted temperament, and good taste, and an unusual natural aptitude. But if he could not master a piece immediately he at once gave up trying to play it. The loss of his mother, from whom he had never been separated, aggravated a heart affection and brought about his own death.

The friendship which existed between Saint-Saëns and Henri Regnault has already been described in Part I. of this book. Saint-Saëns never ceased to regret the suppression of certain portions of some letters to the painter when they were published after his death, and which related to Regnault's high opinion of his friend's music. Professional rivalry was at the root of these editorial excisions; but as the master very sensibly pointed out, the opinions could have harmed the artistic prestige of nobody, coming from an artist in another profession, and biased, as they obviously were, by the mutual love of the friends. And so Saint-Saëns, himself, created a monument to that friendship—his "Marche Héroïque," which, in its original orchestral garb, and in the form of transcriptions, he frequently had performed during his lifetime. Regnault had an exquisite tenor voice, and was, moreover, a cultured musician.

After the performance of the "Hymne à Victor Hugo," which renewed the friendship between Saint-Saëns and Hugo, and which was given at the grand reception at the Trocadéro planned to honour the great man, Saint-Saëns was invited to dine with him, and thereafter was a frequent guest at the house.

In his "École Buissonnière" Saint-Saëns describes, at length, his relationship with Victor Hugo. I quote below from the English translation of part of that book ("Musical Memories," John Murray), as the phraseology of the intimate picture of Hugo's family life, given by the composer, is so good :—

“ I often dined with him informally, with M. and Mme. Lockroy, Meurice, Vacquerie, and other close friends. The fare was delightful and unpretentious, and the conversation was the same. The master sat at the head of the table, with his grandson and grand-daughter at either side, saying little, but always something à propos. Thanks to his vigour, his strong, sonorous voice, and his quiet good humour, he did not seem like an old man, but rather like an ageless and immortal human being, whom Time would never touch. His presence was just Jove-like enough to inspire respect, without chilling his followers.”

In the opinion of Saint-Saëns the artist is entitled to explore all avenues of emotional and psychological experience in pursuit of his art, and to work towards his chosen goal in the manner that seems, to him, best. But this line of conduct should not be regarded as in any sense a duty. It is a privilege, to be made use of when need demands. One might find an analogy between the social position of the music student (or student of any art for that matter) towards humanity in general, and that of the medical student (or other science student). The work and research of both is for the ultimate good, and happiness, of humanity.

Without hard work, and constant application, he did not think that any artist, however bounteous his natural endowments might be, could ever become really great : could ever advance his art (and, incidentally, civilisation) a single step in the evolutionary process. For that, and not the plaudits of the multitude, is the mission, and the acid test, of great achievement, whether applied to art, science, religion, or even politics.

The artist who can cover the entire field of his own particular art has not yet been born. That is an opinion that was held by the subject of this volume, and constitutes, I consider, the best refutation that can be made of the irritating and entirely untrue custom, due to slovenly thought, which certain writers on the art of Saint-Saëns have formed, of stating that his great claim to consideration lies in his all-round excellence.

The art of Saint-Saëns reveals notable failures, as well as splendid triumphs. A reference to Part III. will, I think, demonstrate this, and the fact of their existence is a sign of his genius. Genius oft-times rushes in where ordinary mortals fear to tread. Sometimes, like a skilfully-managed aeroplane, it soars into the empyrean blue; and sometimes, like the man-made instrument of flight, it gets out of control, dashes earthwards, and meets disaster. But it never plays for safety. It is manipulated by invisible levers.

Saint-Saëns considered that there was room for artists of all kinds, owing to the vastness of the domain of music. For, indeed, music is bound up with most conditions of life, and musicians of varying abilities may find each his special metier.

There is the music of simple kind, the function of which is an amusement; the music connected with ceremonies, with birth, marriage, and death; that which is associated with the message of religion, or intensifies the appeal of the art of the dramatist, and the poet; there is the music of Nature, and the worker; and that which exercises the highest office of all, by stirring the quiescent divinity in humanity.

The master expressed the view that the cinema, like the concert, should be used as a factor in education. That by means of the moving picture science, and art, might be shown to the public in their true relationship to everyday life, and as the foundational principles to which it is beholden for the amenities of civilised life which it enjoys, and accepts, as a matter of course. By this dictum he did not, I think, pretend to originality—for he was thoroughly conversant with current schools of thought—but merely desired to emphasise a truth.

He voices this opinion regarding music for the masses (“Musical Memories”):—

“Music holds so high a place in the modern world that we ought to begin with that. There is plenty of gay music, easy to understand, which is in harmony with the laws of art, and the people ought to hear it instead of the horrors which they cram into our ears under the pretence of satisfying our tastes.

“What pleases people most is sentimental music, but it need not be a silly sentimentality. Instead, they ought to give the people the charming airs which grow as naturally as daisies on a lawn in the vast field of opéra-comique.

"That is not high art, it is true, but it is pretty music, and it is high art compared with what is heard too often in the cafés. I am not ignorant of the fact that such establishments employ talented people. But along with the good, what frightful things one hears! And no one would listen to their instrumental repertoire anywhere else!

" very often, even at the theatres, the managers satisfy their own tastes under the pretence of satisfying that of the public. That is, of course, intensely human. We judge others by ourselves."

This is a good, and eminently practical, doctrine for spreading the appreciation, and knowledge, of the best music. Just as the child must learn to walk, before he can run, so must the musically untaught individual be gradually accustomed to an appreciation of the structural beauties, and intellectual value, of music on its highest plane. Its emotional service will then be enduring, instead of the transitory—if pleasurable—"exhalation of art," to which Victor Hugo likened it.

PART III

THEME I

THE CONCERTOS

The writing of works for a solo instrument and orchestra was a form of musical composition much favoured by Saint-Saëns. If we regard the list of works belonging to this class enumerated in the Appendix, we find that there are twenty to which, in this broad sense, the name "Concerto" might be applied. Some of them represent the work of the composer in its most inspired and characteristic vein, and display his constructive ability at its best.

Following, I shall discuss the compositions that adhere in general detail to the accepted ideas of a concerto, i.e., briefly, symphonic works of three or four movements which have an important part assigned to a solo instrument.

Remembering the master's earliest associations with music, and his favourite rôle as an executant, it is quite in the natural sequence of development that his five concertos for piano-forte and orchestra should occupy an important place in his creative output.

Concerto No. 1, Op. 17, in D (1858-9, published 1875), for pianoforte and orchestra. Dedicated to Mme. Alfred Jaël.

This early concerto shows clearly the influence of Mozart (first movement) and Beethoven (second movement); but it is also individual to the extent of the very copious passage work, in scales and arpeggi, for the solo instrument, which is characteristic of its successors. The influence of earlier masters even is discernible in the melodic outline and accompaniment figures.

The Andante commences with a subdued hunting-call theme, on the brass, that might have been lifted from a Mozart sonata. But even then, the Saint-Saëns of the future peeps forth in several bars of cadenza of a strongly individual kind.

The second movement, Andante sostenuto quasi adagio (the composer of twenty-four was apparently particular about gradations of emotional condition!), contains a very beautiful theme that is dealt with, variazioni, and with interjections of cadenza to the extent of cheapness of effect. The orchestra has little to say, and the movement is in the nature of an intermezzo.

The third movement, Allegro con fuoco, is, as pointed out, Beethovenish. There is an exquisitely pleading, secondary theme that finally gains the ascendancy and triumphs over the trumpery first subject. During the transition it acquires ethereal beauty, as announced on the wood-wind over a ceaseless, running commentary of arpeggi, upon the piano. Here, indeed, is a suggestion of Liszt, whose constructive methods began to insinuate themselves upon the young composer's artistic vista some six years previously.

Concerto No. 2, Op. 22, in G minor, for pianoforte and orchestra (1868). Dedicated to Mme. A. de Villers, née de Haber.

The first movement, Andante sostenuto, has a long cadenza for the solo instrument with arpeggi over a tonic pedal 8va G, over the whole expanse of the keyboard, from bottom to top, then descends, and ascends, in a bravura scale passage (G minor) in fifths, succeeded by three declamatory chords of the seventh. To this succeeds more arpeggi, followed by chordal passages over an octave pedal. After two bars of prelude, by pianoforte, the orchestra enters on a sustained tonic chord, for brass and woodwind. The first theme :—

Alte Can. No. 2. Op. 22. in G minor of heroic, and elevated, mood, is then stated by the piano, first as a melody over a flowing accompaniment for the left hand.

This theme undergoes considerable amplification, growing in intensity and passion, and there are conversational passages between the solo instrument and the strings, and showy scale passages in octaves, for solo, before a plaintive theme

Pfe. Con. N^o 2, Op. 22, in G minor

pfte

of syncopated rhythm is announced on the pianoforte.

Afterwards comes the brilliant working out, supported chiefly by sustained chords for the strings, parts of the opening theme being heard in various sections of the orchestra. The theme is again heard in octaves (p.) for the right hand of the soloist, with arpeggi for the left hand.

Arpeggi sweep up and down the keyboard, and through this wealth of colour, in rising crescendo, is heard an impression of the theme, high in the wood-wind, before a cadenza for piano, and a recapitulation, which includes the pedal and arpeggi prelude matter, brings the movement to a triumphant conclusion, tutti.

The second movement, Allegro scherzando, is airily graceful in character, and one of the most charming ever written. It is in six-eight time throughout, and the colour impression of ethereal elusiveness is created at the outset by the scoring for the strings, pizzicato, while tympani denote the rhythm. At bar 5 the pianoforte enters with a theme of an elfin capriciousness, a veritable Danse de Puck. This is gaily bandied about between the solo instrument and the various sections of the orchestra, modulation assisting in the variety of colour obtained.

Pfte. Con N° 2. Op. 22. in G minor

A bridge scale passage brings the piano to an accompaniment figure of rocking rhythm, reminiscent of the twanging of a serenading guitar. The melody of this is given out by the bassoon, supported by the lower strings. Soon the entire orchestra is permeated by the infectious gaiety. The other instruments subside, save for a rhythmic pizzicato on the lower strings, and the piano gives its version of the serenade.

The rhythm of this theme is so compelling that I have heard audiences, even of the best-regulated brands, tapping their feet pp. in sympathy with the musicians!

The music at this part is not very far removed from the border line that separates good, healthy music from the blatantly vulgar. From such a fate it is saved by the abrupt and very effective modulation of the complementary phrase. One need not say much more about this movement. These two themes, under various guises, represent the substance of it.

The third movement, Presto, opens with a brisk rhythm of quaver triplets in common time. The thematic material is slight. The principal theme is a lively tarantella, with a subsidiary theme, generally heard in unisons, that provides an effective contrast. The chief interest lies with the solo instrument, the orchestral writing being often merely a filling-in. But the pace is maintained and the work comes to a rousing conclusion.

Concerto No. 3, Op. 29, in E flat (1869, published 1875), for pianoforte and orchestra. Dedicated to M. E. M. Delaborde.

This concerto is seldom, if ever, played now. The mood is often inchaotic, but not morose, and when the exceedingly vigorous third movement is reached (Allegro non troppo), a condition of almost blatant optimism becomes supreme.

The Third Pianoforte Concerto opens, Moderato assai, with a rippling figure, in arpeggio demi-semiquavers, for the pianoforte, pp. After a few bars a suave melody rises above this, on the brass and wood-wind, being allotted to the various instruments according to pitch. In due course the strings re-inforce the wind, and the soloist is ceaselessly busied with arpeggi and scale passages which culminate in a richly-coloured molto crescendo in passages of chromatic chords which lead to a flamboyant Allegro maestoso. A curious theme, Moderato assai (molto tranquillo quasi ritenuto a piacere), is ushered in in unisons, by the piano. The rhythm is unusual. In a bar of four-four one finds alternating with normal bars in groups of four semiquavers. A brilliant development ensues, and a recapitulation, on classical lines, is rounded off by a coda and cadenzas.

The second movement, Andante, is neither long nor particularly arresting, and serves as an intermezzo between the chaotic and striving mood of the first movement, and the brisk, dance rhythm of the last.

The third movement, Allegro non troppo, is an energetic march in two-four which is treated con variazioni, and contributes greatly to the verve and effective ending of the concerto.

Altogether, the general character of this work is superficial, but there are many shallower compositions, such as the Weber "Concertstücke," whose raison d'être in concert repertoires is the opportunity which they offer for technical displays of apparent difficulty.

Concerto No. 4, Op. 44, in C minor (1875, published 1877), for pianoforte and orchestra. Dedicated to M. Antoine Door, Professor of Pianoforte at the Vienna Conservatoire.

Deeper emotions than one commonly finds in the pianoforte works of the master pervade this concerto. The mood is predominantly tragic; first in the dumb, helpless manner that arises from an unexpected, and poignantly hopeless, sorrow, and then with the succeeding transitory stages of passionate revulsion, dull resignation, a gleam of spiritual hope, and attempts to forget, leading to the creation of a more heroic, a calmer, and a loftier state.

Under the stress of his emotion, the composer forgets to scintillate in his customary manner, via a plentiful assortment of devices for technical display on the pianoforte. Instead, one finds that the embroidery used is a natural outcome of the prevailing mood of stress and inward questioning.

The method of construction (cyclic) shows a continuity of emotional conception throughout the entire work.

The sorrowful questioning theme

Con N° 4 (Part I) Op 44, in C minor with which the Allegro moderato opens on the violins, accompanied pizzicato by the lower strings, and soon amplified to a passionate climax on the pianoforte, is frequently heard during about two-thirds of the concerto, which is divided into two parts.

There is also in Part I another binding figure—

Pfte Con N° 4 (Part II)

a short, chromatic theme of two phrases, which is used at the opening of the Allegro vivace of Part 2. Homogeneity is further aided by the use, throughout, of an exquisite chorale-like subject, which, speaking first of resignation, in a steady rhythm, undergoes metamorphosis, and towards the end of the final Allegro is heard as an expression of heroic triumph, played first in single notes in three-four time (unlike the four-four of the original entry) by the pianist's right hand.

Pfte. Con N° 4. Part II

Part 1 consists of the Allegro moderato and an Andante; Part 2 of an Allegro vivace and Andante, and the final Allegro, the movements being continuous excepting for the break between the two parts.

This beautiful concerto is clearly absolute music. It is of Saint-Saëns' best, and that says much.

Concerto No. 5, Op. 103, in F, for pianoforte and orchestra (1896). Dedicated to M. Louis Diémer.

The last of the pianoforte concertos begins quietly with a sustained chord of the tonic, for the wood-wind, against an ascending passage, pizzicato, for strings. The solo instrument enters with a statement of the principal theme, calm, reflective, and chorale-like in mood. This is repeated in the upper section of the orchestra by the strings and wood-wind, while the solo instrument is busied with decorative arpeggios. An ascending scale passage in sixths leads to a figure that is much used throughout the movement.

Pfte Con. N.º 5. Part I Op. 103 in F

There is a second theme, Dolce un poco rubato, graceful and languorous at first, and then growing in animation until a cadenza of broken chords leads to an emphatic declamatory figure and a resumption, a tempo, of the brilliant passage work in sixths, and characteristic figure, for solo, already alluded to.

Thus, in the principal subject-matter of this somewhat long movement the music alternates in mood between the calmly reflective and the amorously agitated, and the tonal colour is rich, varied, and free from turgidity.

The second movement, Andante (three-four), is strongly charged with impressions of the environment of the Nile.

An irregular rhythmic figure appears to set the pace of bustle and movement on a steam-boat; above the din one hears a strident melody shrilly sung by some Arab carriers. The boat glides out upon the calm waterway. From a distance is wafted a fragment of a plaintive little air—

After Canon N° 5, Part II

After Canon N° 5, Part II

The mood becomes serious. There are passages of a recitative character, and gorgeous rich chords, strongly reminiscent of a rhapsody of Liszt. Then the boatmen sing a barcarolle, a flowing cantabile melody in two-four over an accompaniment in arpeggi. This continues for some time, both in the writing for solo instrument and in various sections of the orchestra, and then there is an amusing sound picture of the movement of the propeller, and a piquant little strophe, a little impertinent, is heard for a brief spell. A long passage, à la cadenza, for pianoforte, presages a resumption of the opening rhythm, and the movement, after transitions of tempo and mood, almost as varied as those of the first movement, ends pianissimo.

In the third movement, Molto allegro (two-four), save for a roll on the tympani, the pianoforte enters alone with a vigorous and barbaric theme of rhythmic insistence.

Op. 5. Part II

pfe Molto allegro

It expands into a graceful dance measure. Complementary to it is a flowing, expressive melody, a little tinged by pensiveness, and coloured, emotionally, by an undefinable longing.

In one form or other, and undergoing various modulations, these themes pervade the movement. The vigorous mood triumphs, and the concerto concludes with an orchestral tutti that is a blaze of colour.

This is a gracious and delightful work, at the popularity of which, both with the public and with virtuosi, one cannot marvel. The last movement in particular abounds in opportunities for technical triumphs, both digitally and tonally for the pianist, and the concerto, in this respect, could hardly have been conceived by a composer who was not himself a great pianist.

Saint-Saëns has left, to the world, three concertos for violin and orchestra. The third, in B minor, is the only one that is much played to-day. It rivals the Second Piano Concerto in popularity.

Concerto No. 1, Op. 20 (1859, published 1868, in A, for violin and orchestra. Dedicated to M. Sarasate.

This early concerto is a comparatively brief work consisting of an Allegro, an Andante espressivo, and an Allegro the material of which bears considerable relationship to that in the first and makes the plan of construction cyclic. Thus is shown an early leaning towards a style of structure favoured by the composer in several of his later works.

A virile theme in six-four opens the concerto on the solo violin, after a chord, tutti. There is a subsidiary theme, a trifle Espagnole, melodically, and these, embellished in various ways, comprise the substance of the movement. There is much double stopping and cadenza passages before a prolonged trill leads into the Andante espressivo, all too brief, perhaps, in its simple beauty.

The orchestration is straightforward to the point of barrenness, and there is little trace of chromaticism throughout this elegant composition.

Concerto No. 3, Op. 61, in B minor (1880, published 1881), for violin and orchestra. Dedicated to Mons. P. Sarasate.

The Third Concerto for violin and orchestra enjoys a popularity with solo violinists and the public that is not exceeded by the violin concertos of any other composers.

There is, indeed, nothing to wonder at in this. To explain the attraction, tersely, one need only regard the wealth of melody presented by its thematic material; its perpetual "aliveness," and the opportunities for virtuosic display which abound in it.

The first movement is headed Allegro non troppo, and a few introductory bars, pp., precede the statement of the principal theme, forte and appassionato, by the solo violin. This theme is so familiar that it need be no more than indicated by excerpt here.

Vln Con N° 3. Op. 61. in B minor

Vln solo

This passionate challenge is thrown out against an orchestral background, lightly sketched in, and at its conclusion there is some brilliant double-stopping for the soloist. There is a contrasting theme of tranquil mood that serves to enhance the glowing colour of the first subject ere it re-appears, brightly decorated with arpeggi, double-stopping, and trills, ere the movement comes to an end.

The slow movement, Andantino quasi allegretto, is certainly one of the most ethereally beautiful ever penned by the master. It is like the echo of a song, wafted across the expanse of a peaceful lake, from a little boat drifting idly, with its freight of youth, towards the setting sun. It is a care-free barcarolle, languorous in its happiness,

Vln. Con N^o 3. Op. 61, in B minor over a rocking figure of six quavers for the strings, and imitative echoes for the wood-wind and brass. The mood is but slightly altered by a short section of a more animated character, and concludes with an elaborate cadenza of thirteen bars of broken chords, all sounded in harmonics, and generally regarded as a tour-de-force technically. Poetically, the effect is of a most gradual evaporation of sound as the little boat drifts out of sight.

Vln solo

The third movement, Molto moderato e maestoso, is full of life and virile force, and the warmth of Southern skies. The solo instrument enters with a passionate throb that is like a smouldering fire, ready to burst into a fierce flame at the slightest encouragement—

Vln Con N°3, Op. 61, in B minor

Vln solo

Soon we have a motive that will not be denied the happiness of life, and is alternately assertive and cajoling—

Vln Con N°3, Op. 61, in B minor

Vln solo

Then victory—

Vln Con N°3, Op. 61, in B minor

Vln solo Piu allegro

victory that is intoxicated with the ecstasy of reciprocated passion; victory that sweeps onwards in arrogant indifference, to whatever life may still hold, because it believes it has found love.

There are two concertos for violoncello and orchestra. The first is an early work, and was dedicated by the young composer to a friend, a 'cellist, much his senior, whom he held in great esteem.

Concerto No. 1, Op. 33, for violoncello and orchestra, in A minor (1872, published 1873). Dedicated to M. Auguste Tolbecque.

There is a fresh spontaneity about this concerto, and a sureness of touch, that probably explains the popularity which it enjoys. It may be of interest to mention that M. Sergei Rachmaninoff expressed to me his warm appreciation of its charm and delicate beauty.

Compared with the average concerto this is a short work. It is written in three fairly well-defined sections which are continuous in performance,

Cello Con. N° 1. Op. 33 in A minor strikes a mood of vigorous assurance at the outset, and appears throughout the entire concerto. But there is much more thematic material, too extensive to quote from here.

The middle section is sometimes played as an artistic entity, apart from the rest of the composition. It is plaintively appealing, and of altogether exquisite beauty, cello Con N.º 1, Op 33, in A minor to the strings of the orchestra, con sordini, supply an accompaniment of elusive character that is like the faintly-heard echo of a minuet.

The Second Concerto for violoncello and orchestra, No. 2, Op. 119, in D minor (1902), is dedicated to M. J. Hollman.

The Second Concerto for violoncello and orchestra was published in 1903, and is, constructively, a fine work; but one does not find in it the emotional depth, allied to æsthetic beauty, which gives its predecessor high place among the art-creations in the history of the world's music.

Following a structural design of which he frequently made use in his concertos, Saint

CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS

Saëns has written the Second Concerto for violoncello in two parts, the movements within these being continuous.

The concerto opens with an energetic theme,

Cello Con. N.º 2, Op. 119 in D minor given out, first, by the orchestra, and then taken up, solo, by the violoncello. The mood becomes calmer, and the music is effective for the cantabile style that can be made extraordinarily appealing by a good soloist (when he has a good 'cello!). There are harmonics that stand out clearly against the slight orchestral background—a mere suggestion of substance, like the mists that float slowly above marsh-land, on an autumnal morning.

A crescendo, however, brings a re-statement of the energetic, opening theme, and the introspective mood evaporates—just as the mists do before the heat of late morning.

In the Andante sostenuto that follows, the mood is meditative—melody for the violoncello and chords for orchestra that are reflective in their import.

Part 2 begins Allegro-non-troppo, with bustling energy, and something of defiance. There are conversational passages between soloist and orchestra.

An extended cadenza, quasi-recitative, for solo, which is reminiscent of the preceding material, and is like a mental summing-up of an experience, begins what may be regarded as the fourth movement, which is actually concerned with a recapitulation of the principal theme used at the opening of the concerto, but now heard in the key of D major.

PART III

THEME II

THE SYMPHONIES & SYMPHONIC POEMS

Saint-Saëns wrote—perhaps one should say “completed”—five symphonies, of which only three are published and only one, the Fifth or so-called Third, is much performed.

The First Symphony constituted, as we have seen in Part I. of this book, the master’s “arrival” as a composer. In other ways it was important. It brought him closely into touch with Berlioz and Gounod, who were to have an important influence upon his life; it furthered his relationship with the Seghers, through whom he was to meet Mme. Segher’s old teacher, Liszt, who influenced his creative art largely, and who was a friend of friends to him; and, what is probably of equal importance in his artistic development, this early success with an important form obviously stimulated the ambitions of the youth. Within the next six years the Second (in F), Third (in D), and Fourth

There is another theme of note, first announced by the wood-wind and brass,

First Symphony in E♭, Op. 2

which in its confidence of mood, if not in its actual shape, bears affinity to a theme of which considerable use is made in the last movement. The second movement, a Marche Scherzo, is exceedingly graceful. Over thin harmonies, pp., on the strings, two oboes give out the theme that is indicative of its dominant mood—

First Symphony in E♭, Op. 2

It is so careless, so full of youthful joie-de-vivre, so free from the emotional stress with which the music of the composer's middle and later periods is charged, that regarding his art comprehensively one realises the tremendous psychological development which took place.

The third movement, an Adagio, is more noteworthy for its advanced harmonic progressions, and the introduction of a harp into the instrumentation—then unusual—than for any marked emotional expression. It is, perhaps, over-long.

Another matter of interest is the merging of the third movement into the fourth, an Allegro maestoso, from which a quotation is made above. In addition to the usual assortment of wood-wind, brass, and strings, the ambitious youth has included in the scoring of the Finale of his First Symphony, two saxhorns, three tympani, cymbals, and four harps. Probably this was the part of the composition that particularly provoked the comments of Berlioz and Gounod.

There are full chords for the harps which naturally enriches the orchestral colour.

The mood of the symphony is exuberant throughout, to the point of defiance. It is as though the new composer was conscious of a dawning independence and decided to fling down his gauntlet in the lists of Art.

Apart from the chronological interest, and a certain triteness that occasionally obtrudes, this work impresses one as well worth performance because of its intrinsic beauty. Certainly it ought to be more palatable to present-day audiences than some of the Hadyn still resuscitated.

But then, it would require rehearsal!

The Second Symphony (Fourth), in A minor, Op. 55 (1859, published 1878), is dedicated to M. J. Pasdeloup.

This symphony opens Allegro marcato with a broad theme of steady rhythm, six crotchets in the bar—

Second Symphony in A minor, Op. 55

Vln I Allegro marcato

Soon, however, the signature alters to quick common time, and the mood to Allegro appassionato. The subject of the opening section appears in an altered melodic guise, and the rhythm becomes

The music, at first pleading, gradually gains assurance as the development proceeds on a classical model, until it attains a condition of emphatic affirmation, tutti and ff., in the concluding seven bars of the movement.

It is as though a wish, half formulated, became at length definitely realised, and insistently demanded recognition.

The second movement is headed Adagio, and is in three-eighth time. It is quite slight and of short duration. The violins, sordini, at once announce a theme which is artlessly direct in its folksong-like charm. The English horn (solo) makes reply, and then the strings repeat this little song. The orchestration is delicately appropriate.

Second Symphony in A minor, Op 55

The mood is quiet, but not sad, and the emotion goes no deeper than a passing regret.

A bright and vivacious Scherzo Presto (three-four) takes shape in the third movement. The writing is often polyphonic, and some strident, declamatory passages in double octaves are reminiscent of Beethoven. There is, indeed, nothing very individual about the movement, which might have been written by any well-equipped musician. Nevertheless, it was the part of the symphony that pleased the audience most at a performance, under the direction of the composer, before the Royal Philharmonic Society on 26.3.1898.

The last movement is marked Prestissimo (six-eight), and the principal theme, a rippling melody in quaver triplets which begins on the last beat of the bar, is ushered in by the violins, accompanied by the other strings, pizzicato. Soon this melody is doubled by the flutes, and is, later, harmonised on the rest of the wind and the strings. The movement, indeed, partakes of the character of a rondo, of which the Mozartean theme is the recurring one.

This symphony impresses one more with its composer's proficiency in technique than with evidence of outstanding artistic prominence. As the work of a young man of twenty-three it is remarkable, as having been done in an age when the education necessary for the writing of a musical work of dimensions was more difficult to obtain than it is to-day. The Adagio and Prestissimo alone make it worth more frequent performance.

The Third Symphony, Op. 78, is in C minor, and is dedicated to the memory of Franz Liszt (1886).

In this splendid symphony one finds a revelation of Saint-Saëns that is uncommon throughout his numerous works, and that is altogether entrancing.

The symphony is divided into two parts, each containing two movements which are continuous. A very full orchestra is employed, including the unusual feature, in scoring for a symphony, of an organ and two pianofortes.

Merely subordinate use is made of the latter. They are mainly employed in the playing of scales and arpeggi in Part 2; but the organ, which makes its first appearance in the second movement of Part 1, has some very beautiful solo work allotted to it, and belongs integrally to the conceptive idea.

A few impressive chords, Adagio, herald the mood of grave questioning that pervades Part 1, even when the prevailing manner, Allegro moderato, of the first movement is denoted by an agitated theme, first heard on the strings. The following figure of it appears in an infinite number of modulations throughout the symphony :

Third Symphony in C minor Op 78

Vn I & DB

It ebbs and flows, like the voice of conscience, or like materialistic desires, struggling for supremacy over the exaltation of a dawning spiritual serenity. A beautiful theme, announced first on the Cor Anglais, and continued by the wood-wind, appears symbolical of an exalted mood, when heard above the agitated figure on the strings. Eventually it subsides entirely; but just as surely as humanity is declared, and divinity is made impossible, by the presence of the Old Adam in us, so do we find the restlessness of this semiquaver figure recurring after an expression of spiritual ecstasy impressively suggested, by several bars in unison, for the whole orchestra.

The entry of the second movement, marked Poco adagio (pp.), accords with the chastened mood in which the preceding one ends. To obtain an atmosphere suggestive of religious consolation, Saint-Saëns has not relied upon any devices of tonal mimicry, but has employed the very direct means of the organ and four strings (violin 1 and 2, viola, and violoncello). Here is the noble theme, heard on the violins, to which the organ and lower strings supply simple harmony that enhances its grandeur.

Third Symphony in C minor, Op. 78

Vln 1-2

Some delicately-conceived arabesques for the strings, supported by solemn chords on the organ, suggest a state of care-freedom. A figure from the previous movement, reminiscent of earthly desires, appears on the double basses, to be taken up, crescendo, by the upper strings. A mystical effect is secured by the employment of the peculiar tonal qualities of the organ and wind, in an unprepared modulation, before the organ swells forth in a broadly-grand manner, and the movement concludes quietly.

SYMPHONIES & SYMPHONIC POEMS

Part 2 begins Allegro moderato, and f., and is also ushered in by the strings in agitated fashion, against sustained chords for wood-wind and brass with a figure which may be regarded as a rhythmic variant of that at the beginning of Part 1. The mood of expectancy is maintained, and the indication changes to Presto. The music becomes buoyantly exuberant. There is, perhaps consistently enough, a theme, the rhythm and outline of which (in bars of two-four), indicated by this brief quotation, suggest soaring. The subject-matter, both of the Allegro moderato and Presto, is repeated before a short and quieter section, Allegro moderato, in the style of an Intermezzo, and fashioned from yet another variant of the opening theme of Part 1, is reached, and before the fourth movement, Maestoso, begins, with a full chord, f., of the tonic major, for organ, and a grandiose subject, in alternating bars of six-four and nine-four, tutti.

Third Symphony in C minor. Op. 78

The two pianos are busied with arpeggi in groups of semiquaver sextolets, p., providing (with slight support in sustained chords on the organ) a tonal background of delicate beauty for the "conscience" theme, broadly harmonised, and played by the whole of the strings, divisi.

It is as if we gazed upon a profile of the Christ, in bas-relief of snowy marble, standing out, emblematic of truth and hope, from a shimmering base of silver and purple.

Around this subject the music gains in significant triumph. Variations of time signature are frequent. Among the most remarkable may be cited those of three-one and three-two, which are perfectly inevitable interpolations in the (usually) steady rhythm of 12 and 6 crotchets in the bar, and are of considerable importance in urging onwards the feeling of majestic grandeur that leads to the climax of the Finale, where organ and orchestra, in a richly-hued wave of sound, express the very definite attainment of rest at a journey's end.

This sublime work may, conceivably, be cherished by posterity along with the other treasures of musical art that are a common heritage of all humanity.

The Symphonic Poems, four in number, date from 1871-77. The last, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," was thus finished nine years before the death of Liszt, whose genius, in evolving this form (foreshadowed by Beethoven in his Ninth Symphony), Saint-Saëns desired to establish in perpetuity.

While he considerably widened the scope of the form in his Second, Third, and Fourth Poems, it is questionable if his work, fine although it is in many respects, will prove to be more than a stage in an evolutionary process that will take definite shape in yet another form. A dozen years later, Richard Strauss, in the third of his nine contributions to the same form, "Tod und Verklärung," carried the development still further. There is a biology of the Arts as well as of the Sciences.

The earliest of the Symphonic Poems, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Op. 31 (1871, published 1872), is dedicated to Mdlle. Augusta Holmès—that meteoric creature of Irish birth and French adoption, who wrote a little music of imperishable beauty and much of tawdry gilt that has tarnished to verdigris ages since; and whose admirable contempt for the conventions in her feminine impersonation of Don Juan was at one period the amusement of Paris and the horrified scandal of our grandmothers.

Saint-Saëns, to a certain extent, came under the influence of this extraordinary woman, but it is a little unbelievable that he could have regarded her as more than an "episode."

Bearing in mind his ability for judging matters, in a detached way, from affaires of the heart to computations of art-worth, the programme of the Poème may be regarded as satirical. At any rate the dedication is peculiarly appropriate.

The composer expresses his conception of the legend of Hercules at the feet of Omphale; and, in the broader sense, the allurements of sexual attraction.

In his prefatory note, he states that the opening figure,

Le Rouet d'Omphale. Op. 31

(indicative of the whirr of the spinning wheel) is chosen only for rhythm, and to give character to the work. This figure persists, with but scant interruption, throughout the entire poem.

It is heard at the commencement, in the Andantino, from the first violins (con sordini) and then on the flutes (pp.), in alternate bars. This scoring, combined with the abrupt change of key which also occurs, produces a peculiarly celestial impression—a sense of a vast space in which is heard musical sounds of ethereal delicacy; a feeling of something altogether remote from the earth.

After some preludial material of this description, of gradually swelling tone-volume, the rhythm of the Omphale motif is announced by the wind. The melody of the motif is first heard on flutes and violins. The time-signature is six-eight, and the odd rhythm accentuates the piquant allurements suggested by the chromatic progress of the melody. Thus, indeed, might Eve have beckoned to Adam when he first beheld her in the Garden.

At any rate, Omphale beckons to very considerable purpose. She becomes a little tearful, and then whirrs her spinning wheel and resumes her song, infusing into it greater intensity and a new significance. The orchestral colour is pervaded by this song, and we hear a premonitory sound of the Hercules motif.

This is a theme of nobly expressive character, and after a considerable struggle for supremacy it triumphs. The emotional stress subsides, and we have a resumption (but Allegro) of the opening mood. The Omphale theme, now in the guise of a Scherzando, mocks the fall of the hero. The sounds trail gradually away into silence—the desolation of a heart deceived and made light of—and, like a ghostly memory is heard the whirring of the wheel and the thin, almost inaudible sound of a harmonic A on the first violins.

The harp is freely employed, and contributes to much of the suggestion of feminine yielding, and grace. There is a pretty continuous background of orchestral colour, and the harmonisation is often thick.

"Le Rouet d'Omphale" is a popular work, although much less so than the third of the Poems, the "Danse Macabre"; but it cannot be regarded as being on its author's highest plane. The technical resource is admirable, clever; but the sentiment is usually replaced by sentimentality. On occasion I have found it boring.

The Second Symphonic Poem, "Phaëton," Op. 39 (1873, published 1875), is dedicated to Madame Berthe Pochet, née de Tinan.

The prefatory note by the composer to this work informs us that it is concerned with the mythological story of Phaëton's wild ride through the sky, in the chariot of his father, the Sun (Zeus). The rash youth loses control of the steeds, and the flaming chariot approaches the earth. Disaster threatens the globe, but Jupiter hurls a thunderbolt at the charioteer and thus prevents the impact of the chariot with the earth.

The Poème begins, Maestoso, and f., with an impressive chord for the brass and ascending passages for strings, and then for wood-wind, in demi-semiquavers, terminating in a full chord of the tonic, tutti.

Harp, which are freely employed throughout, supported by the strings, then announce a figure, Allegro animato, which, in one section or other of the orchestra, permeates practically the entire work.

This theme is rhythmically suggestive of the impatient pawing of the steeds, anxious to be off; and later, as it undergoes changes of both accent and key, of their galloping career.

One envisages the gorgeous scene. The handsome, imperious youth, glowing with pride of responsibility and the prospect of his adventurous journey through limitless space, and barely able to control his team. Around him the glory of the Sun, and the faint blue of the dim distance broken by fleecy, white clouds.

A noble theme, on the horns, appears to symbolise the farewell advice of his father, Zeus.

Phaëton traverses space. There is a certain sense of assurance, and defiance, in the new theme heard, f. and marcato on trumpets and trombones in unison, and then taken up, ff., by the wood-wind.

The charioteer rushes onwards at a headlong pace. Harps, divisi, in arpeggi, and richly-coloured chords add their quota of movement to the agitated re-iteration of the rhythmic opening theme on wood-wind and strings. The music increases in animation, then the second theme of Phaéton is given to both wood-wind and brass to an accompaniment of agitated quaver triplets on the strings.

A new theme, of a reflective, pastoral type, may symbolise the youth's dreams of future power. He becomes heedless of the wildly erratic pounding of the hoofs in front of him, but their sound grows in insistence and forces attention. He attempts, unsuccessfully, to regain control.

The tumult increases, and culminates in a blare of sound from the entire orchestra, fff. Jupiter hurls the thunderbolt! The fateful race is finished.

One hears the voice of Zeus again, sorrowfully mourning; and there is an agonised version of poor Phaéton's once triumphant theme, ere the poem end.

"Phaéton" is a very beautiful composition, delicately sensitive in colour suggestion by reason of the skilful instrumentation and the clever juxtaposition of the major and minor modes which, even at the outset, gives to the music an eerie feeling of ominous dread: a kind of premonition of impending disaster.

The Third Symphonic Poem, "Danse Macabre," Op. 40 (1874, published 1875), is almost the best known to the general public of all the master's works. By the "general public" one means, of course, that section of the public that does not, ordinarily, attend concerts of good music, or West End recitals; but that hears its music via the café orchestra, the en'tracte in the theatre or music hall, and the cinema. By the same channels this public knows the name of Saint-Saëns as the composer of "Softly Awakes my Heart," although they have probably never heard of "Samson et Dalila"; and of "The Swan," although if reference was made to "Le Cygne" and "Le Carnaval des animaux," from which it is the sole published number, they would be equally uninformed.

✓ The "Danse Macabre" was suggested by some verses of Henri Cazalis, and, briefly, is concerned with a spectral waltz danced in a graveyard by skeletons, which behave in a thoroughly conventional manner by commencing their revels after the clock has struck the hour of midnight, and then decorously returning to their tombs at cock-crow.

There is nothing at all original in the scoring, although the composer has succeeded realistically in translating the grisly and unpleasant idea of the verses into terms of music.

The twelve strokes of the witching hour are sounded by horn and harp, and muted violins are used in the time-honoured "mystical" manner. And then we have the only really original idea in the whole Poem—the tuning of the E string of the solo violin, that gives out the melody of the waltz, half a tone lower. The clattering bones are obviously imitated on the xylophone, and cock-crow is imitated on the oboe. "Tricks" (as Saint-Saëns would probably have agreed himself) "that every well-equipped musician has up his sleeve."

Probably the cheapness of the effects in this work is responsible for the light regard in which one sometimes finds the works of the master held by serious musicians who are probably only acquainted with his compositions of "popular" genre.

The Fourth, and last, of the Symphonic Poems, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," Op. 50 (1877, published 1877), dedicated to Mr. Henri Duparc, has the following literary preface affixed to it by Saint-Saëns:—

"The fable relates that at the beginning of his life Hercules saw two roads opening before him; that of pleasure and that of virtue. Insensible to the allurements of the nymphs and bacchantes, the hero enters the path of strife and combat, at the end of which he discerns, through the flames of the stake, the recompense of immortality."

"La Jeunesse d'Hercule" has a theme of striving, and assertive, character as its leit-motif. This theme may be regarded as emblematic of the hero's personality.

Soon, on the wood-wind, and later with harp support, is heard a little theme, espressivo, in nine-eighth, which has an airy grace, and a rhythm that is fancifully suggestive of beckoning hands. The suggestion of this theme is undoubtedly allurements. Even thus early in his progress, the hero encounters the nymphs, and bacchantes.

A dance figure, Allegro (quick common time), in the rhythm of which there is a hint of barbaric abandon, is used in working up to a mood of revelry before the return of the broadly-noble Hercules motif, ff., seems to indicate an effort of the hero to cast aside the wiles of his temptresses.

This is followed by an Andante sostenuto, in which the motif grows more insistent, and the scoring is grandiose in style. A re-appearance of the nymphs' theme—now in crotchet triplets to the bar of common time—perhaps indicates that temporary surrender to the animal passions may influence the growth of spiritual perfection.

The finale is a Maestoso of short duration.

Great use is made in it of agitated sequential groups of demi-semiquavers to create the impression of the triumphant hypothesis of Hercules.

“La Jeunesse d’Hercule” is a sensitive appreciation of the literary text, united to fine constructive ability. The poetical conception is lower, however, than that of “Phaéton.”

PART III

THEME III

CHAMBER MUSIC

Saint-Saëns has left over a dozen works which belong to the category of Chamber music, and particulars of them will be found in the Appendix.

His work in this peculiarly exacting realm of composition is eloquent of his sound musicianship and the clearness of his part-writing. Often, too, is present, in the emotional expression, an intimate sense of naïveté as unspoilt as that of a light-hearted, lovable child.

In the year in which his first symphony was published (1855) he wrote his first chamber work, the Quintet for pianoforte and strings, Op. 14, which was published ten years later by J. Hamelle, Paris. It is distinctly classical in feeling and construction, and shows certain mannerisms that became established subsequently. In fact, it shows a logical expansion of the independent outlook exhibited in the symphony alluded to, which was, of course, written two years earlier.

The next composition belonging to the category with which we are now concerned is the popular Trio in F, Op. 18, for pianoforte, violin and violoncello (1863, published 1867), dedicated to Mons. Alfred Lamarche. The mood in this trio is one of light-hearted confidence, the pure happiness of a care-free mind amid congenial surroundings, rather than the confidence that is born of arrogance, or of the grim determination to succeed.

A steady rhythm of three-four is established in the first four bars of the Allegro vivace, in which the work begins, before the violoncello announces an irresponsible little melody—

Trio in F. Op. 18

'cello

It is repeated by the violin, and then by the piano, which, at the conclusion of its amplified version, gives another theme, little more than a figure, which undergoes considerable development throughout the movement.

The Andante is quite short and charmingly fresh. The piano states the theme, in unisons, against a sustained octave A on the violin.

Before the end of the duet the viola enters with a doubling of the melody on the piano, and then these two busy themselves with a gracious accompaniment when the violin sings the tune.

There is a contrasted subject—

Trio in F Op. 18

a flowing melody given entirely to the strings before a brief repetition of the first subject brings the movement to an end.

The concluding movement is a Scherzo (Presto) of varied themes and epigrammatic style. A fragment of the first theme of the Andante appears, but inconspicuously. A condition of suppressed excitement is apparent. There is much brilliant writing, particularly for piano, and the Trio concludes emphatically, molto allegro.

There are two Quartets for Strings. The First, Op. 112, for 2 violins, viola, and violoncello, was composed and published in 1899, and is dedicated to Mons. Eugène Ysaÿe.

It contains four movements. The opening Allegro molto is of serene and happy mood. The second subject ripples onward with the careless abandon of a brook in Maytime. There is a strangely accented theme that enters somewhat dramatically with a bar of twelve-four, soon altered to six-four, for viola, before the development and recapitulation on the usual lines of sonata form.

The second movement, Molto allegretto quasi presto, is a gay rondo. There is a certain allurement about the theme announced by the first violin, accompanied pizzicato by the lower strings, and, in due course, varied to groups of quaver triplets.

1st String Quartet Op. 112

Vln I Molto Allegretto quasi Presto

The slow movement, Molto adagio, is concerned with an aria for violin 1 of a longing, empyrean type, which becomes a little passionate, a little regretful before it concludes. The movement ends on an harmonic A, for all the parts.

In the final Allegro non troppo there is a resumption of the mood of the first movement, and a good deal of clever part-writing, sustaining the interest for all the players before the brilliant ending.

The Second Quartet for Strings, Op. 153, for the same combination of instruments as the First (2 violins, viola, and 'cello), was composed in 1919, and is therefore an example of the concluding work of the master. It is dedicated to Mons. Jacques Durand. The first movement, Allegro animato, opens energetically—remarkable as an expression of emotion from a man of eighty-four; but after considerable vigour, and variations of rhythm, key and subject-matter, the music evaporates, pp., in a chord of the tonic (G major) for all the instruments.

2nd String Quartet Op 153

Vln¹ Allegro animato

Two personalities appear to strive for supremacy in the very expressive second movement of this quartet. The figuration indicative of the first, pessimistic and heavy, is labelled Molto adagio. Opposed to it is an Andantino cantabile, a little vague, a little wondering, but calmer, and more hopeful. These moods alternate throughout. It is as if two dear friends discussed a problem, and the one sought to sustain and encourage the other; but the movement ends in a state of questioning.

The third movement is marked, "Interlude et Final." The Interlude is a serene Andantino laid out chiefly for the two lower strings. It is succeeded by an Allegretto con moto that has about it the fresh joyousness of a sunny day in spring. The following figure, which recurs frequently in all the parts, is largely responsible for this genial impression :—

2nd String Quartet Op. 153

Allegretto con moto

Much earlier than the quartets for strings is the Quartet in B flat, Op. 41 (1875), for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello. It is a musicianly work, classical in structure, and bound together by thematic allusions in the last movement to subject-matter that occurs in the first. There is a fine chorale in the Andante maestoso, and, later, an example of the whimsical style of writing that one finds in the Allegro scherzando of the Second Pianoforte Concerto, and in the "Danse Macabre." The piano quartet has enjoyed considerable popularity.

Sonata No. 1, Op. 32, in C minor, for violoncello and pianoforte (1872, published 1873).

The dramatic opening of this impressive sonata, indeed the emotions expressed during the whole of the composition, are surely influenced by the trials through which Saint-Saëns had just passed, from which, in fact, he was hardly free, at the time of its conception.

1st Sonata, 'cello & piano, in C m or. Op 32Allegro
'cello

The agonised sobs of these opening bars remind one of the anguished chords with which Chopin begins his Sonata in B flat minor, Op. 35, for pianoforte. The emotion is turbulent, and the pianoforte is busied with rapid semiquaver passages in scales and arpeggi, against a broad melody for 'cello.

A period of calm in the tonic major is soon swept aside in the development section of the movement, and the mood becomes increasingly stressful, brief, calm passages, pp., serving but to increase the poignancy of the emotion.

The second movement, Andante tranquillo sostenuto, consists of a lovely melody—

'minorAndante tranquillo sostenuto
cello

In the pianoforte accompaniment to this the theme is allied to harmony of chorale-like clarity. The melody is then elaborated, and varied in its presentation.

This Andante is an exquisite piece of work, imbued with a sense of the ineffable calm, that is half languor, half resignation, which may come to the solace of emotions overwrought by a very desolation of grief.

The mood of the last movement, an Allegro moderato, is one of rather passionate defiance, significant of renewed strength, and courage in Life's battle. The opening theme,

1st Sonata, 'cello & piano, in C minor Op. 32

'cello

to which there is an agitated accompaniment, in semiquavers, for pianoforte, serves as an index to the emotional condition dominating it. There is much brilliant writing for both instruments.

Sonata No. 2, Op. 123, in F (1905, published 1905), for violoncello and pianoforte. 'Dedicated to Mons. Jules Griset.

The Second Sonata for 'cello and piano is an elaborate and musicianly brilliant, rather than an emotionally intense, work. It demands technique of a high grade from both performers, throughout.

In the first movement, Maestoso largamente, two individualities are indicated. One is of an energetic, bustling kind, and is denoted chiefly by the following rhythm, in varying melodic figures—while the other is playfully flippant—

2nd Sonata 'cello & piano, in F Op 123

A beautiful theme introduces an element of serenity into the duologue. The development of the material is on classical lines.

The second movement, headed Scherzo con variazioni, and beginning Allegro animato, is a really fine example of the variation style of writing. The statement of the bustling theme is made by the piano in unison octaves. Of this there are eight variations, pleasantly contrasted in rhythm and mood.

A "Romanza," Poco adagio e molto espressivo, with melodiously grateful writing for the 'cello, sustained mostly by an accompaniment of broken chords and arpeggi on the piano, occupies the third movement.

The last movement, Allegro non troppo grazioso, is indeed of a gracious and flowing character. It is like the harmonious conclusion of a conversation, begun in some dissent, and made tender and amiable by reminiscences of past happiness.

There is a delightful little cantabile theme of which much use is made.

PART III

THEME IV

VARIAZIONI

To discuss in detail the very large miscellaneous output of Saint-Saëns is quite beyond the space of the present work. If one considered the many songs and small pieces for instrumental solo and duet seriatim, in a larger book even, no really useful purpose would be served, for they belong to the class of music that is most likely to be already in possession of the musically-interested reader.

There are, however, several fine and important works of dimensions that belong to none of the usual forms already considered, and that I have therefore decided to regard collectively under the above heading.

Foremost of these compositions must be placed the beautiful Fantaisie for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 89 (1891), to which the composer gave the title of "Africa." There is no dedication, a rather unusual circumstance for an important work of the master's.

The Fantaisie is, constructively, a tone-poem for pianoforte and orchestra. The music is, frankly, programmatic, but it is programme music that attempts, and with conspicuous success, to conjure, by means of aural suggestion, a vision that is almost tangible in the intensity of its appeal to the emotions.

Listening to the reedy little air—

"Africa" pftc & orch. Op 89

Oboe

that issues, first from the oboes and then from the flutes, above a steady rhythm of six-eight in the strings of the Molto allegro, one might be the unsuspected hearer of the commencement of the native music ushering in a night of religious dance revels in an African village.

Increasing animation is imparted to the music by the entrance of the solo instrument with the theme in bold, double octaves, while the strings maintain their re-iteration of the quaver figure and the higher wood-wind sounds tied chords. The instrumentation further suggests the tum-tum sounds elicited by the fingers of negro musicians from gourd and skin drums, and the soft movement of the cool evening breeze.

The frenzy of the dancers increases. More worshippers at the shrine of the god who happens to be the object of the ritual become possessed by the divine afflatus and sway uncertainly. The accent of the music is erratic, from the normal to a stress on the first, third, and sixth beats in the bar.

Brilliant scale passages for the pianoforte lead to an Andante espressivo in three-four that might be a fragment of a folk song. Calm succeeds the emotional stress, like the peaceful glow of a cool evening after a thundery day.

This mood does not endure for long, however. Soon, pp., returns the monotonous imitative drum taps, on the strings, and the dance re-commences.

Fragments of melody, like the sighs and murmurs of lovers in the glamour of the perfumed night, appear and disappear in the general hubbub and blare of tonal colour which eddies around the principal theme alluded to, and for a considerable time the music pursues its course, ff., to a brilliant termination. The revellers have abandoned themselves to the spell of the African night, and will dance until they sink to the ground in a stupor of exhaustion.

"Africa" is in the freest Fantasia form. It gives plenty of scope for technical display, including sound production, and is very popular alike with artists and public.

Two other works, for pianoforte and orchestra, which are popular as concert pieces, are the Allegro appassionato, Op. 70, and the Rhapsodie d'Auvergne, Op. 73. Both belong to the year 1884.

The former is a graceful composition, Allegro, Andantino, and Allegro, in which the pianoforte is employed with the thematic material and its elaborations, in the first and last sections, and the orchestra provides, in the middle part, a brief period of reposeful contrast. The Allegro appassionato is a favourite with concert pianists, but is of no great importance.

There are several compositions for violin and orchestra, notably the Introduction et Rondo Capriccioso (1863, published 1870), Op. 28; the "Havanaise" (1887, published 1888), Op. 83, a brilliant work very familiar to concert-goers; and the Caprice Andalous (1904), Op. 122.

The Introduction et Rondo Capriccioso referred to above is dedicated, like so much of Saint-Saëns' music for the violin, to the late Señor P. Sarasate. The Andante malinconico (two-four) opens with a questioning theme for the solo violin. This theme is somewhat amplified before a brilliant arpeggio passage, terminating in a couple of bars of trilling, leads to the Allegro ma non troppo (six-eight) at the middle of the fourth bar of which the soloist announces the theme of the Rondo. It is of a delicately fresh character, essentially violinistic in its halting rhythm, and is duly succeeded by a second theme of more tranquil mood.

After both, and especially the initial theme, have passed through various rhythmic and modulatory metamorphosis, and have afforded the violinist opportunity for the display of all manner of technical fireworks, including some effective double-stopping, the brief Piu allegro is reached. Here the solo instrument is engaged, from start to finish, in a display of scale and arpeggio playing which rushes onwards until the fourth last bar, and ends in a blare of sound for the whole orchestra. The work is exceedingly popular as a show piece.

Marche Héroïque, Op. 34, for orchestra, dedicated to the memory of Henri Regnault (1871, published 1871). Composed, as related in Part I. of this book, to the memory of a dearly-loved friend of Saint-Saëns, who was killed during the siege of Paris in 1870.

This march is mainly vigorous, and optimistic in mood. Save in the rhythm of the introductory matter to the last section it is not of the customary "Marche militaire" type.

The central Andantino is tenderly expressive of deep sorrow. A beautiful figure in three-four is given to the violins, pp., with a solo theme for trombones and colourful harmony for harp and wood-wind.

Undoubtedly the charming "Suite Algérienne," Op. 60 (1880, published 1881), is among the most popular of the orchestral works of lighter genre left to us by the master. The suite contains four numbers which are sometimes performed as separate items.

No. 1, Prélude. (A street in Algiers.) Molto allegro (six-eight).

The music begins, pp., with a roll on the tympani, which, by the way, continues to rumble, in muffled sounds, for about fifty bars. A fragment of a theme is heard, soon, on the violoncellos. Later, it is amplified, and transformed to use as a little air—of reedy, Oriental timbre, such as a Moorish street musician might tootle on his early morning perigrinations. Animation arises gradually, in the tone picture presented, until an arresting figure, oddly harmonised in fifths and thirds, reminds one of the gendarmes. Largely by the employment of unison passages, and flowing arpeggi, the composer preserves the thinness and monotony of colour that is conventionally Moorish.

The street we are asked to imagine is a busy place of life and movement. Apparently it is in the picturesque native quarters, and has nothing to do with the modernised French localities of the city. Perhaps one ought to substitute "little" for "nothing," for as the music subsides into silence we hear, in the distance, a little bugle call, unmistakably martial, that must surely issue from a barracks.

No. 2, "Rhapsodie Mauresque." The second number of the suite is marked Allegretto non troppo. It undergoes frequent changes of time signature and rhythm, and constitutes an excellent example of exotic assimilation. Not for a moment, as in the first number, are we permitted to think of other surroundings than those implied by the title.

The melodic material, plentiful enough, is mostly in the shape of fragmentary little figures—one can hardly term them themes—reminiscent, either of a reed instrument voiced by wind, from a goat-skin, or the mouth of the player.

Cymbals, triangle, and tympani, are freely used towards the close, and a sense of cross-rhythm (two-four against three-four) is established in a dance measure which brings the Rhapsodie to a clangous, and scintillating, conclusion.

No. 3, "Rêverie du Soir," is marked Allegretto quasi Andantino (six-eight), and is short and reposeful. Scraps of melody, chiefly on the wood-wind, are vaguely reminiscent of the scenes conjured by the two preceding numbers of the suite. The strings are employed in a manner imitative of the twanging of a guitar.

No. 4, "Marche Militaire Française." Allegro giocoso (quick common time).

A vigorous, military march about which little need be said. The thematic material is tuneful, and the orchestration highly decorative—

Suite Algérienne N° 4. Op. 60

Vln I Allegro giocoso

But although a piece of this description is conceivably an actuality in a picture of Algiers, the impression jars, and one feels that the suite would have benefited, poetically, without the addition of this number; or else by the substitution for it of a less blatant composition.

An examination of the list of compositions for piano solo written by Saint-Saëns reveals the surprising fact that there is not even one Sonata among them. For very many years, as everybody knows, the sonatas of Mozart and then of Beethoven, held sway in this particular musical form—their influence is still strong—and it is feasible to think that Saint-Saëns very possibly, in his earlier years at all events, did not wish to be classified with the lesser composers of the period who turned out sonatas and sonatinas for the use of girls' seminaries. Since, however, Chopin and Schumann had but recently made notable contributions to that class of pianoforte literature, and Liszt (who, both as a composer and a man, the young man was wont to regard as a model) indicates new possibilities in his Sonata in B minor, it is, I repeat, surprising, to the point of amazement, that no Sonata for piano alone is published. Among the scribblings of his childhood he hints that such a composition existed, but we know that he destroyed many of these fruits of immaturity. But many early overtures, cantatas, and so forth went the same way, so that the circumstance is no explanation of his neglect of the form in his maturity.

Some of his numerous transcriptions for piano are almost as popular with pianists as his few original works of importance. Examples of this kind that one involuntarily recalls are the transcription of the Chorus of Dervishes from Beethoven's "The Ruins of Athens," the "Caprice sur les airs de ballet d'Alceste" of Gluck, and the transcription of the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's immortal overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

However, his Opus 3 (Op. 2 is the first symphony) is devoted to six bagatelles for piano (1855, published 1856), and there are two books of six Etudes (Op. 52, 1877, and Op. 111, 1899), which are notable, and useful, contributions to the library of the pianist. Most concert-goers have heard the "Etude en forme de valse" and the "Etude de rythme."

Duets, written for one and for two pianos (four hands), received considerable attention. The "Variations sur un thème de Beethoven"

(i.e., the Trio of the minuet in the Sonata of Beethoven, Op. 31) (1874), and the fine "Scherzo" for two pianos, Op. 87 (1889, published 1890), alluded to in Part I. of this book, are representative of this sphere of productivity.

The songs, numerically, far exceed in importance all the other compositions for instrumental solo. The beautiful "Mélodies Persanes," sung first by the composer's friend Henri Regnault; "Pourquoi rester seulette," "Danse Macabre," "Extase," "Désir de l'Orient"—in such as these the vocalist, who is also an artist, is well served. There are also a number of vocal duets.

The vocal scena, or ballade, for mezzo-soprano and orchestra, "La Fiancée du Timbalier" (1887, Op. 82), to the words of Victor Hugo, and the "Air du Rossignol" from the incidental music which Saint-Saens wrote to Mme. Jane Dieulafoy's drama "Parysatis" (1902) are both favourites with the more ambitious of our women vocalists.

The works which the master wrote specially for the organ have been somewhat overshadowed in popularity with soloists on that instrument by transcriptions from his operatic and orchestral works. The attention of organists may be directed to the two books of Three Preludes and Fugues (1894, Op. 99, and 1898, Op. 109), and to the later of the four Fantaisies enumerated in the Appendix.

The fact that three of the last compositions given Opus numbers, i.e., "Cyprès et Lauriers," Fantaisie Op. 157, and "Prière," are concerned with the organ is indicative of an abiding affection for that really noble, but much abused, instrument.

PART III

THEME V

WORKS FOR THE STAGE

Early environment, associates of student days, and inherent fondness for the theatre and for the rôle of mime, in private amusements, are all circumstances that make the predilection of Saint-Saëns for expression, via Opera, easily understandable.

His mother's friends, the Garcia sisters (Mme. Malibran and Mme. Pauline Viardot), and the circle in which they moved; Gounod, Rossini, Auber—all his seniors, all devoted friends of his, and all, as everybody knows, conspicuously successful in their time as composers of operatic music; his most intimate fellow-students and contemporaries at the Conservatoire—Bizet, whose success at a period that was peculiarly difficult for young composers who desired to shine in opera, was encouraging; Massenet, whose popularity was even more level; Delibes, whose ambitions, like those of the young Saint-Saëns, lay opera-wards—all spoke and thought of opera, all regarded success in that art-form as their Elysium.

What has this influence produced in the form of opera?

Baldly speaking, some thirteen works, one of which is not entirely the work of Saint-Saëns; and of these thirteen, only one, "Samson et Dalila," has achieved permanent favour with the public.

The success of this one work has, however, been tremendous, and has gained for the master, solely on account of its creation, lasting recognition as a composer of grand opera.

The success of "Samson et Dalila" has overshadowed all later and earlier works. Addressed casually regarding Saint-Saëns' operas, ordinarily well-informed fellow-musicians are prone to reply, "Yes! Delightful work, 'Samson and Delilah,' isn't it?" or, "Oh! I can't stand 'Samson and Delilah!'" Too much" according to the breadth, or narrowness, of the speaker's outlook. But never a word about any of the other twelve brethren!

Saint-Saëns was not well served in the matter of plot and libretto for the majority of his operas. This was, for him, peculiarly unfortunate. His sensitiveness to extraneous suggestion, to anything in the nature of a programme, which explains the appeal of his instrumental programme music (and of "Samson" for that matter), prevented him from ignoring his libretto as other composers, whose talents lay in the creation of absolute music, have done when saddled with a stupid or badly-constructed libretto. What, for example, would Saint-Saëns have made of the insipidity of the libretto in "Il Seraglio" or "Il Flauto Magico"? Or Mozart of the intensity of the situations that arise in "Samson" and "Henry VIII."? I make the grotesque suggestion to illustrate my thesis that the emotional make-up and inherent common-sense of the Frenchman made it impossible for him to accept the wild improbabilities and utterly artificial state of affairs in the conventional operatic story.

This is shown in the "plot" of the first opera "Le Timbre d'Argent," the libretto of which, by Michel Carré and Jules Barbier, was given to the composer, at the request of Auber, by Carvalho, the director of the Théâtre-Lyrique. Several other musicians had refused it!

The story is, briefly, a re-hash of Faust, but—and here lies probably the explanation of the failure of the opera—the fantasy is not courageously maintained. Evidently its wild improbability was too much even for the authors, or the composer (who has recorded that he had alterations made in the libretto), for any dramatic strength it possesses is negated, at the end, by the explanation that the whole thing is but a dream!

The devil takes the name, and character, of Doctor Spiridion. The hero is a young painter, Conrad, who is engaged to a beautiful, and good, woman, Hélène, but who is attracted, indeed, fascinated, by the allurements of a dancer, Fiametta. Now, the dancer, like many of her profession, loves the good things of life, and Conrad craves a plentiful supply of lucre in order to gratify his desires of the moment.

This is an opportunity really too good for the devil to miss! He presents Conrad with a magical bell that will grant his need of gold when it is rung, but that will at the same time cause someone near to him to fall down dead.

Conrad, a very commonplace kind of an Adam, goes on ruthlessly, after the manner of his kind, until one day the victim of the spell, by means of which he is able to live his riotous life, chances to be his friend, Benedict. Between the horror of this, and his still slumbering love for Hélène, he breaks the bell, and the spell, and—awakens!

The music is not very interesting, and unequal. But considering the many alterations which the opera underwent, before its production on February 23rd, 1877, under a subsidy from the Ministry of Fine Arts, at the (then) bankrupt Lyrique, this fact is not remarkable.

Poor Saint-Saëns could not induce Carvalho to listen to the music for two years after his feverish writing of it!

Carvalho, and his wife, when they eventually heard it, liked it at once; but the impresario, like some theatrical managers of to-day had more than a weakness for "arrangements" and "collaborations"—particularly mean forms of vandalism when forced upon impecunious creative artists—and so, more delay. Then came the failure of the Lyrique.

At the Opera was a director of similar ambitions. He wanted a burlesque part for a favourite of his; in fact, the opera was to be cut about again to suit the lady who was really much more important than a work of art! Deadlock, once more!!

After that, a dancer who proved to be only a mime; a tenor who, for no sane reason, threw up his rôle; the war of 1870 and divers other worries all occurred to delay production until 1877. Really, the pre-natal history of this opera is more absorbing than the plot of the opera itself!

It was repeated at Brussels two years later, and again in 1907 at Monte Carlo. But neither these, nor later revivals, have been enduringly successful.

The overture is worth concert performance, and one of the airs, "Le Bonheur est chose légère," was heard quite recently in London with violin obbligato. Bizet prepared the piano and vocal score.

The efforts of Saint-Saëns to secure performance of "Le Timbre d'Argent" brought him into touch with du Locle, who, to fill in time while they waited for a dancer, introduced him to Gallet and suggested that they should co-operate in "La Princesse Jaune," a little one-act piece with which Saint-Saëns made his début on the stage on June 12th, 1872.

There is some uncertainty about the year. The composer himself, in his "École Buissonnière," is contradictory. He says that he was thirty-five when this little opera was produced. That would mean that it was performed during the unrest of the summer of 1870 that preceded the national tragedy of the autumn—which is hardly likely. And, further, he says that it was in 1871 that he first met Gallet over this very matter of collaboration. We may, therefore, accept the year given as being most likely correct, which means, of course, that the composer was almost thirty-seven at the time of his operatic début.

Japan was a European craze of the period. The two artists were all for a purely Japanese creation—naturally. To this, du Locle demurred. The compromise was therefore adopted of making a young Dutch scientist conceive an infatuation for a Japanese statuette, and under the influence of a drug, fancy himself in Japan. On awakening from the "sleep" he finds his cousin, who loves him, by his side.

The piece is a fragile fancy to which the composer wrote charming music. The score bears evidence of his penchant for oriental colour, and happy knack of suggesting it.

The work has had successful revivals in France, and might be heard here advantageously.

While "Le Timbre d'Argent" was pursuing its uncertain course towards production, the composer was writing his happy "hit"—"Samson et Dalila," first simply styled "Dalila" and then "Samson," and produced, through the instrumentality of Liszt, at the Grand Ducal Theatre of Weimar on December 2nd, 1877.

Saint-Saëns has freely acknowledged that without the help and influence of Liszt, who, although he had not heard a note of the opera, engaged him to finish it and produce it at Weimar, "Samson" would probably never have seen the light.

The composer had already given a private performance of the second act at his house, when Regnault was the "Samson." His friends thought he must be mad to attempt a Biblical subject. No manager would listen to him. Here, in England, we went one better in broad-mindedness and refused to sanction its performance, on the stage until 1909. In France they were a little better. They heard it in 1890, first at Rouen and then in Paris, after its triumphs all around had, figuratively, shamed them into hearing it. Lacking moral courage we sanctioned its performance, as an oratorio, at a concert at Covent Garden, in 1893, under Sir Frederic Cowen.

Without attempting to pry into the minds of those individuals who fondly believe that their own particular little latch-key is the only one that will cause the gates of Heaven to swing back—since this book is concerned with the life and art of a genius, and not with theology—I will pass on from this phase of the opera's production and consider the familiar material of which it is made up.

The plot, around which Ferdinand Lemaire has written his libretto, adheres to the Biblical story. The appeal is human, natural, and thoroughly straightforward. It is of long ago, it is of to-day, it is for all time, for it is of human love and passion, and its betrayal—and who does not imagine himself, or herself, in either of the title-rôles? And for those who do not apprehend these things there is spectacle in gorgeous profusion.

— There is no overture. The construction of the musical edifice is cemented together by the recurrence of thematic material. The acts are divided into scenes, which was an innovation, like the absence of overture, at the time the opera was written.

The curtain rises with the commencement of the grave music, and the sound of the voices of the children of Israel bemoaning their captivity, first heard from behind the curtain. Music for chorus is usually either dull or rowdy in effect. In this case dullness is avoided in the nick of time by the dramatic arrival of Samson, and the episode between him and Abimelech. Shouting their revolt the crowd rush from the stage and the high priest of Dagon enters and discovers the insurrection.

At this juncture a group of Hebrew patriarchs chant an ancient psalm in praise of the deliverance of their race. If this is well sung it is effective; but that is, unfortunately, seldom the case, and so the audience often experiences a very dull patch before the arrival of Delilah, with her maidens, and her garlands of flowers, appears, and begins her allure-ment of the strong man. An old Hebrew acts the rôle of conscience, and wise counsel, and attempts to stem the current of the swiftly-growing fascination that increases in its devastating effect upon Samson.

The voluptuous appeal of the music, melodious, rhythmically compelling, and subtly challenging in its suggestion of pent-up passion, proves irresistible. The high priestess of Dagon gains a moral victory as her maidens dance entrancingly and she sings her famous song of Spring.

The action of the second act takes place outside the house of Delilah, at nightfall, in the valley of Sorek. Saint-Saëns got his idea for the tempest which rumbles through this act from the tempest in the last act of Rossini's "Othello."

The ominous atmosphere of this sullen mood of Nature provides an appropriate background for the intrigues of Delilah and the High Priest, who plot the downfall of Samson; and later renders almost sinister her feigned outburst of passionate entreaty in the melody, best known of all as an except from the opera, "Mon cœur s'ouvre à ta voix."

Still Samson vacillates before the enchantress. Then, goaded to action by her behaviour as she rushes into the house, he follows her, and is shorn of his glory and his strength.

A great deal depends here upon how the shorn locks are exhibited. If they are held aloft, as sometimes happens, it is almost impossible to repress one's merriment. The thing savours of farce. But that can quite easily be avoided by showing them—when such a course is adopted—in a derisive, instead of in a triumphant, fashion.

Act III. contains a tableau and a fine, spectacular scene, and is thus planned with thought for the exigencies of staging.

The tableau shows the blinded and shorn hero turning the grinding-mill. To Heaven he appeals in anguished manner for mercy, and the voices of his fellow Israelites are heard, accusing him of having failed them.

The final scene is a very splendid one, and shows the interior of the temple of Dagon. The sacred fire is burning a bluish flame. They frequently contrive to make it ascend and descend to the rhythm of the music, a rather flamboyant canon in the singing of which the high priest and Delilah lead.

Samson makes his appearance in this scene, led in by a little boy. Delilah, with true vixenish enjoyment, taunts him, with his subjection, by singing fragments of the love-motifs from the seduction phase of the enslavement. Samson is then led away.

There is a sparkling ballet to exquisite music of the Eastern colour so beloved by the master. This item, like the famous song, and the dance of the priestesses already alluded to, is very often heard as a separate item at concerts, in cafés, played by seaside bands; in fact, everywhere, expected and unexpected. It is founded on a genuine Oriental theme given to the composer by General Yusuf.

Samson, in a powerful voice, standing between massive pillars at the back of the stage, appeals to Heaven for strength if only for a moment, to annihilate his enemies. The structure falls and all are buried beneath its ruins—at least such is the effect at the abrupt, and most dramatic, conclusion of the opera.

Étienne Marcel, an opera in four acts, words by Louis Gallet, was first produced at Lyons on February 8th, 1879.

It suffers from a conventional "happy" ending, atop of distinctly tragic incident.

The plot is, briefly, concerned with insurrection in Paris in the year 1358, when, under the regency of the Dauphin Charles, Étienne Marcel, a provost of the merchant classes, planned a revolt against the regent, lost his popularity with the mob, played traitor, and opened the gates of the city to Charles of Navarre.

The love interest centres around his daughter, Beatrice, and an equerry to the Dauphin, Robert de Lorris.

Marcel is assassinated, for his treachery, and his daughter throws herself, tragically, upon his body. Her lover tries to induce her to flee with him.

At this stage, by all the unwritten laws of opera, the lovers should die or be killed, together; or "curtain" might have been arranged for in some manner less harrowing to the feelings of the tender-hearted.

Instead, we have a flourish of trumpets, heralding the entry of the Dauphin, and the opera ends vociferously.

The music is pleasing, and adequate. The composer finds most scope for his fertile imagination in the scenes of riot and disorder. There is some delightful ballet music, which is sometimes performed at concerts. The opera was revived in Paris at the Théâtre du Château d'Eau.

Henry VIII. (1882, published 1882), opera in 4 acts and 5 tableaux. Words by Léonce Détroyat and Armand Silvestre. German translation by Hermann Wolff. Italian translation by A. de Lauzières. Piano score by Léon Delahaye. Dedicated to M. Vancorbeil, Director de l'Académie Nationale de Musique, Paris, where the opera was produced on 5th March, 1883.

Act I contains six scenes. It opens with a Prélude, of which the thematic material is simply the Sixteenth Century subject, taken by Saint-Saëns from the MSS. in the library at Buckingham Palace. It reads:—

Henry VIII, 16th century theme

Maestoso

Considerable use is made of it throughout the opera.

The plot is concerned with the infatuation of the susceptible monarch for the beautiful lady-in-waiting of Katherine, Anne Boleyn, and is an embroidered edition—elaborately embroidered, one ought to say—of the historical facts.

The Spanish Ambassador, Don Gomez de Feria, and the Duke of Norfolk, have a conversation, in scene 1, in the course of which Don Gomez tells of an intrigue with Anne, and a letter which she has sent him. There is some rather graceful music for his love-sick description of her. This letter is the central subject of the final scene of the opera.

The librettists have not succeeded in making any of the characters very attractive.

Don Gomez is drawn as a sentimental fool; Anne Boleyn as a minx of the most designing type, and, as Katherine latterly describes her, "a girl without a heart." Katherine is pathetically sketched, but is frequently boring and depressing, so that one hardly marvels at the King's change of affections.

The King is represented as a domineering, somewhat irritating sensualist, a little given to self-pity, quite ignorant of fine feeling, and with a fondness for saying to anyone, who chances to be inconveniently present (including either of his wives), "Vous ici? Soit! Madame!"—an idea of brusque bonhomme that prepares one, in a measure, for the last great scene involving the King and the two Queens.

Katherine, very ill, and living in retirement at Kimbolton after the marriage of Henry with Anne, is visited by Anne, anxious to obtain the compromising letter, which has come into the possession of Katherine, by implorations, or, failing these, by imprecations; but Anne fails to recover it.

Henry arrives, at the end of this scene between the women, accompanied by Don Gomez.

Here, indeed, is a thrilling situation. The King also wishes to get the letter. His methods of gaining his desire take the shape of love-making with Anne, before Katherine, who, in her dire misery, calls to God for consolation and strength to survive this culminating affront.

She does not, as the King expects, yield up the letter in a fit of jealousy with the object of harming her rival. Instead, she destroys it, and worn out by the emotional stress of the situation, dies without divulging her knowledge of the import of the missive.

As in "Étienne Marcel," although hardly so damnably, the strength of this ending is considerably weakened by the declaration of Henry, that if he finds his suspicions of an intrigue between Don Gomez and Anne were correct, the hatchet will secure revenge!

Such a remark, although quite in keeping with the vacillating braggadocio of the personality that figures as Henry VIII., is particularly nauseating in the circumstances; but what is of real importance is that it quite spoils what should have been an intensely dramatic dénouement. Quite conceivably it may have militated against a revival of the opera in this country. Otherwise, one can find no reason for the neglect of this (musically) beautiful work.

The plot, if conventional, dealing, as it does, with the eternal triangle, works onwards interestingly to a conclusion. There is well-written music, several beautiful melodies, and ample spectacle, apart from that of the ballet-divertissement which comes between Acts II. and III.

This set of six dances in the ballet is sometimes performed as a suite, in the concert hall, but at the production at Covent Garden the ballet was omitted. Even then, the opera would be long enough. It cannot be said that the "Scottish" dances in the ballet (included, probably, because of the fondness of Queen Victoria for Balmoral) are happily conceived. Her late Majesty was, as we know, a friend of Saint-Saëns, but in these "Scottish" dances exist an example of inspirational coercion that should not have been attempted, even out of respect for a friend. The Fourth No. of the Suite, "Danse de la Gypsy," is, on the contrary, in the composer's happiest vein, thus :—

Henry VIII. "Danse de la Gypsy"Moderato quasi andantino

to an accompaniment of tympani and cymbals. By the introduction of a second theme of barbaric character it achieves a striving, and colourful, climax; for in it is the sincere expression of inherent idiom, plus experience, while the "Scottish" dances are never anything but counterfeit art. The suite, as a whole, apparently constitutes an exception to the usual Chameleon adaptability of the composer. As a matter of fact, part of the ballet was taken from an unproduced one-act opéra-comique.

The structure of the music is on a symphonic basis, thematic material undergoing development and certain melodic figures being associated with the appearance of certain members of the dramatis personæ.

A graceful melodic figure—

Henry VIII. Don G. motifAllegro non troppo

is especially associated with Don Gomez, for example. To Henry, in Scene 4, Act I., is given a fine solo—and he has a very passionate love-duet with Anne; and the song in the final scene of the last act already alluded to. Fanfares and grandiose chords serve as reminders that he is very much "le Roi."

Henry VIII. Solo. Henry
Sc IV. Act I.

Larghetto

The rôles of Katherine and Anne are of almost equal importance. The music associated with Katherine is often lachrymal, sometimes pathetic, and on occasion, dramatic—as in the last scene in which she dies, and in the last scene (6) of the first act, where, with the others, she watches the procession that accompanies Buckingham to the scaffold, after she has, in vain, pleaded with the King on his behalf. Sotto-voce to her lamentations are heard the love advances of the king to his new "woman"—Anne—and the sound of the choir singing the "De Profundis"! In scene 1 of the last act one of the most beautiful, and originally harmonious, little airs in the whole opera is assigned to Katherine, the alternating five-four and three-four, and the abrupt key changes being suggestively prophetic of her impending doom.

Anne has her greatest opportunity for display in the aria with which she occupies scene 3 of Act II., "Reine! Je serai Reine!" The melody is suave, Andante con moto, a little florid. The harmony, very elaborate and ornamented, reminds one of the old-fashioned Italian florid arias for soprani.

The music in the latter scene between Katherine and Anne is of a most animated description. The syncopated accompaniment figure is charged with the seething restlessness of scarcely bridled spite and jealousy.

In the big scene with the Papal Nuncio expressive use is made of the Sixteenth Century theme, and there is much spectacular effect in the scene in which the populace acclaim their King although the Pope has excommunicated him.

Even considering the blemishes alluded to in this description of the opera, "Henry VIII." is an art-creation that ought to be staged with the regularity that its fine qualities merit. Since the master himself sanctioned a performance, during his lifetime, with the ballet omitted, that manner of presentation might be adhered to, and one of the weak features eliminated.

I commend the opera to the attention of those active in the present operatic renaissance in Great Britain.

The rôles are arranged as follows :—Henry VIII., baritone; Don Gomez, tenor; Cardinal Compeggio, Papal legate, bass; Duke of Surrey, tenor; Duke of Norfolk, bass; Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury, bass; Katherine, soprano; Anne, mezzo-soprano.

Proserpine, drame-lyrique en quatre actes. Words, after the play by Auguste Vacquerie, by Louis Gallet. Produced at the Opéra-Comique, 15th March, 1887.

This adaptation by Gallet of the melodrama of Vacquerie contains excellent operatic possibilities of which Saint-Saëns made good use. It was most favourably received when produced, and one scene was encored.

The story is one of human passions, and portrays an incident of unrequited love in Italy of the Sixteenth Century.

Proserpine is a beautiful courtesan, who is madly in love with a young nobleman, Sabatino. Unfortunately for her, another woman, Angiola, has already enslaved the object of her desires, and is engaged to be married to him. She is, further, the sister of his friend, Renzo.

Prosperine enlists the sympathies of a bandit, Squarocca, and endeavours to do her worst to the lovers—at least to her rival.

There is an intense scene where she declares her love for Sabatino, and then tries to plunge her stiletto into Angiola. When prevented from doing so by Sabatino, she plunges the weapon into her own bosom, and dies.

Originally, the dénouement permitted Prosperine to stab her rival, and then be killed by Sabatino, who snatched the weapon from her hand—a weak ending which the collaborators thought better of, fortunately, and when Saint-Saëns went on a trip to Ceylon in 1891 he rewrote this part of the opera, the work in its final form being produced at the Opéra-Comique in 1899.

The music often becomes dramatically intense, and there is beautiful melody and gracious harmonies, particularly in an effective convent scene, which had to be repeated at the first production of the opera.

This scene was invented by Gallet to provide the peace, and quietness, necessary for contrast, from a musical point of view, amid so much passion and strife. Vacquerie highly approved of this interpolation.

Ascanio, opera in five acts. Words by Louis Gallet (founded on the drama, Benvenuto Cellini, by Paul Meurice). Produced at the Académie Nationale de Musique, Paris, 5th March, 1890, and at the Opéra 21st March, 1890.

Ascanio is a pupil of Cellini. He loves, and is loved, by Colombe, who is also loved by Cellini. Here is again the triangle; but by way of variation, and complication, we have the unrequited love of two other ladies—Scozzone, who is devoted to Cellini, and the Duchesse d'Etampes, who has conceived a passion for Ascanio.

Here, indeed, is a veritable hell-broth as a basis for plot-making, but the actual working out strains credulity to breaking point, even for a grand opera plot.

Benvenuto, learning of the love between his pupil and Colombe, and of the lady's preference, retires from the field. Further, becoming aware of danger threatening the much-loved damsel from her two rivals, he decides to smuggle her into a convent in an ornamental chest which he has decorated for Ursuline nuns there.

The Duchesse, however, arranges that the reliquary shall rest at her house long enough to suffocate the young rival who thus seeks to escape her vengeance.

In the meantime, Scozzone, repenting of her complicity in the horrible crime planned, and full of the bitterness of a hopeless love, decides to enter the box instead of Colombe.

There is a dramatic ending to all this plot and counter-plot. Cellini, as a reward for his art in decorating the reliquary, asks the King (Francis I.) to consent to the marriage of the two young lovers. The Duchesse, deeming that the time has arrived to gloat over the fruit of her revenge, opens the box and finds, to her horror, that she has killed her fellow-accomplice instead of their mutual rival. In despair, Cellini seeks retirement.

"Ascanio" suffered comparative eclipse from 1891 until its revival, in Paris, in 1921—a revival, which, as related in Part I., was superintended by Saint-Saëns.

The music does not delve deeply into the realms of the cruder emotions; but in the lighter scenes it is gracious, and often brilliantly orchestrated. There is a ballet that contains some of the composer's most attractive writing; and spectacular effect is not lost sight of.

Phryné, opéra-comique, in two acts. Libretto by L. Augé de Lassus. Produced at the Opéra-Comique, Paris, 24th May, 1893.

This little work is concerned with the affairs of a courtesan, Phryné, and her old and young lovers, who happen to be uncle and nephew. It is an amusing and gracefully conceived opéra-comique, and bracketed, in performance, with "La Princesse Jaune" or "Hélène" (see Appendix), which last, although the inferior work, would give greater contrast—would provide an evening performance.

L'Ancêtre, lyrical drama in three acts. Words by L. Augé de Lassus. Produced at Monte Carlo 24th February, 1906.

The action is laid in Corsica. It concerns a vendetta in the relentless enactment of which a fearful old woman, the Ancestress, devises unwearied machinations. The plot is a re-hash of the story of Romeo and Juliet, and therefore need not be detailed.

This opera achieved a great success at its première. Its revival in Paris in 1911 was also encouraging. The music is powerfully sketched into the tragic picture, and in the lighter moments it is charmingly fresh. I give this brief resumé in the hope of stimulating the interest of operatic managers and producers.

Les Barbares, tragédie-lyrique, en trois actes et prologue-symphonique. Words by Victorien Sardou and P. B. Gheusi. Produced at the Académie Nationale de Musique, 23rd Oct., 1901.

Saint-Saëns was enthusiastic about the prospects and "story" of this work, but although it was well received, it was not given many times at the Opéra, upon its appearance there.

The action centres upon the invasion of the town of Orange by Teutonic barbarians. Pillage is averted by Floria, a priestess of Vesta, who secures the safety of the inhabitants of the city by yielding to the advances of Marcomir, the chief of the invaders. The Roman consul, Euryalus, has been killed, during warfare, by an unknown man, who, as Livia, his widow, discovers, was Marcomir. A sense of poetic justice attends the murder of Marcomir, by Livia, who uses a piece of the weapon extracted from the body of Euryalus, with which to accomplish her revenge.

The structure of the music to this libretto is vigorous, and cyclic; and the innovation of a Symphonic Prologue, as an accompaniment to a verbal explanation of the action, is decidedly interesting.

That Saint-Saëns left only one ballet, "Javotte," is a matter for sincere regret, for the charm and grace of the music to the ballets in his operas denotes a special aptitude for this particular art-form. "Javotte" is in one act, and three tableaux, and was designed by J. L. Croze. It immediately gained favour upon its production at Lyons, on December 3rd, 1896, at the Grand Theatre; and it had very successful revivals at the Opéra-Comique, on 23rd October, 1899, and at the Opéra, on 5th February, 1909.

PART III

THEME VI

THE CHORAL WORKS

A choral work, the unpublished "Ode à Sainte Cécile" (1852), appeared at the beginning of the career of Saint-Saëns as a composer, and he returned intermittently to the writing of compositions for choir and orchestra of both sacred and secular character, until eight years before his death, when the oratorio, "The Promised Land" (1913), was produced at the Gloucester Musical Festival of that year.

In this final work of the oratorio class, and in some others of its kind, such as "Le Déluge," the feeling is often operatic, so that they provide a bridge, or connecting passage to the more spacious, and more plastic, environment of the stage, from the very restrained emotional opportunity of church music.

There is but one setting of the Mass, the Messe Solennelle (1856, pub. 1857), to the grandeur and beauty of which Liszt paid high tribute. He likened it to "a magnificent Gothic cathedral, in which Bach would conduct his orchestra," and regarded it as comparable to the settings of Bach and Beethoven.

The Oratorio de Noël (1858) is another early work to which cathedral and oratory organists in this country might give regular attention. It was, of course, written at the time that Saint-Saëns received his appointment as organist at the Madeleine.

The music is melodious and simply devotional. There is beautiful part-writing, and opportunities for the soloists in a choir to distinguish themselves. The instrumental writing is for strings, harp, and organ.

The Requiem Mass (1878) is very elevated in its religious fervour, and contains a pathetically beautiful "Agnus Dei." The extraordinary fertility which enabled the composer to write it in eight days almost suggests an uncanny premonition of the tragic deaths of his infant children, which happened soon afterwards. The external circumstances merely point to coincidence.

"Le Déluge" (1875), Poème Biblique en trois parties. Poème de L. Gallet. For solo voices, chorus, and orchestra.

After a few bars of an expressive Adagio, a fugue, beginning—is introduced in the Prélude, which contains some of the thematic material of the oratorio, and is quiet and academic in style. The Prélude is, by the way, sometimes heard as a separate composition.

Le Déluge (Prélude)

The symphonic description of the flood is a truly remarkable orchestral conception for the time of its birth.

Beginning ppp., and headed Moderato-quasi-andante-con-moto, it works up to a terrific sense of terrestrial, and celestial, disturbance by means of chromatic and diatonic (but chiefly the former) figures, arpeggi, and scale passages. These devices are in infinite variety and are mostly written in demi-semiquavers and semiquavers. A very full orchestra is employed at this part of the work, including five trombones and four low sax-horns.

In Part 1 Saint-Saëns contents himself with string support for the voices (S., C., T., and B. *sol*i, and chorus) which are heard, largely in recitative.

Part 3 produces an impression of the verdant renewal of life in its pristine purity.

The musical allusion to the second flight of the dove from the ark, and the return of spring, is aptly (or banally, according to one's view-point) signified by a distorted version of the call of the cuckoo.

The oratorio concludes in hopeful and joyous mood.

"The Promised Land," Oratorio, Op. 140. Première à Gloucester Festival, 1913. Text arranged by Hermann Klein. Dedicated, by special permission, to Her Majesty Queen Alexandra by "her faithful and obedient servant, Camille Saint-Saëns."

This splendid oratorio is in three parts. Mr. Hermann Klein, in his prefatory note, explains that "the text of the oratorio has been taken entirely from the books of Numbers and Deuteronomy, and from the Psalms."

Part 1 deals with the deliverance of the Israelites from Egypt, their sufferings in the desert, and the miracle of bringing the water from the rock.

Part 2 opens with the admonition of the Almighty to Moses and Aaron that "Because ye believed Me not, to sanctify Me in the eyes of the Children of Israel, therefore ye shall not bring this congregation into the land which I have given them."

Part 3 tells of the showing of the Promised Land, by the Lord, to Moses from the hills; and of the death of the patriarch. "So Moses, the servant of the Lord, died there according to the word of the Lord. And He buried him in a valley in the land of Moab; but no man knoweth his sepulchre unto this day."

Discarding the picturesque Jewish narratives that explain why Moses was not allowed to enter Canaan, Mr. Hermann Klein has based his text on the view that Moses' special sin lay in the smiting of the rock with his rod, instead of speaking to it, as commanded by God (Numbers xx, 8).

"The Promised Land" is composed for soli (S., C., T., and B.), chorus, and orchestra. When writing it the composer evidently had the models of Handel, Bach, and Beethoven, in the same form, in mind.

The result is an eminently musicianly, and often impressive emotional, conception of the text. There is nothing, one imagines, to shock the most enthusiastic "Messiah" and "Elijah" Choral Societies upon a first acquaintance with the score; and why, in the cause of variety and good music, we do not hear "The Promised Land" often, is obscure. Conductors of Choral Societies will probably remark that "people don't know it!" Tut, tut! mes amis!! There was a time, I suppose, when even "The Messiah" was "not known"; and also, when you yourselves did not know a note from a rest or a bar line!

Althought the master has largely followed classical precedent in his style of writing, there is ample evidence of his individuality; of the Saint-Saëns of "Samson et Dalila" even.

The sixth number of Part 1, for vocal trio and choir, is thoroughly characteristic; and still more so is the vocal quintet (No. 9 of Part 2), which has an accompaniment figure tremendously significant of the Divine Anger alluded to in the words. The orchestral scoring for the allusion to the bursting forth, and flowing, of the water from the rock is reminiscent of the water music in "Le Déluge."

The No. 12 of Part 3, "The Song of Moses," a fine, broad melody, simply harmonised, is what the brief song reviewers would term "well laid out" for voice (bass), but it is artistically disappointing, bearing in mind its composer. In No. 13 is a fair example of Saint-Saëns as a colourist. The impression of awe and mystery suggested by the command of the Almighty, to the patriarch, to "Get thee up into Mount Abarim, and behold the Land," etc., is realized in a wonderful manner by the composer.

PART III

THEME VII

LITERARY WORKS

The composer who appears in the rôle of author, on occasion, is a figure by no means without precedent in the history of musical art. Among those who have also become famous in the sister art, the names of Schumann, Berlioz, and Wagner occur instantly to the memory. The literary work of Saint-Saëns, however, has not been primarily concerned with any special sphere of writing. In literature, as in music, he has expressed himself in most diverse forms. He wrote philosophy and metaphysics, drama and comedy, poetry and religion and science, and, of course, music criticism, with the same degree of spontaneity that he composed concertos, instrumental and vocal solos, symphonies, operas and opéra-comique, cantatas, oratorios, and music-drama.

A volume might easily be devoted to the critical study of his numerous letters, his poems, and his general literary output, for his remarks are entertaining, his expression provocative of thought, and illuminated by penetratingly clear conclusions, and suggestions, that must sometimes have been more the outcome of intuition than of actual, detailed knowledge. A naïve style of engaging freshness characterises his literary work, much as the instinctive feeling for colour gives to his musical compositions an individualism that is unmistakable.

Consider this extract,* for instance, from the "École Buissonnière," a propos Berlioz's "Requiem":—

"The reading of the score of Berlioz's 'Requiem' makes it appear singularly old-fashioned, but this is true of most of the romantic dramas, which, like the 'Requiem,' show up better in actual performance. It is easy to rail at the vehemence of the Romanticists, but it is not so easy to equal the effect of 'Hernani,' 'Lucrece Borgia,' and the Symphonie fantastique on the public. For with all their faults these works had a marvellous success. The truth is that their vehemence was sincere and not artificial. The Romanticists had faith in their works, and there is nothing like faith to produce lasting results."

Further on, in the same essay, is an example of the impatience with the usual attitude of the world towards the creative artist that is of child-like petulance:—

"He was astonished at the lack of sympathy, and even actual hostility, that he encountered (i.e., in the performance of the 'Requiem'). It would have been more astonishing if he had experienced anything else."

* From the English translation, "Musical Memories."

Clearly, when writing this, Saint-Saëns had a vivid remembrance of the tribulations that beset the production of his opera "L'Timbre d'Argent."

The following passage, from the conclusion of the same essay as the above extracts, is of disarming candour:—

"Berlioz was a genius, not a scholar. The word genius tells the whole story. Berlioz wrote badly (for voices). He maltreated voices and sometimes permitted himself the strangest freaks. Nevertheless, he is one of the commanding figures of musical art. His great works remind us of the Alps with their forests, glaciers, sunlight, waterfalls and chasms. There are people who do not like the Alps. So much the worse for them."

In the essay devoted to his friend Seghers is a passage uncommonly like the expression of the views of a very modern student of music of to-day upon what exactly constitutes music:

"Someone has said lately that where there is no feeling there is no music. We could, however, cite many passages of music which are absolutely lacking in emotion, and which are beautiful nevertheless from the point of view of pure æsthetic beauty.

"But what am I saying? Painting goes its own way and emotion, feeling, and passion are evoked by the least landscape. Maurice Barrès brought in this fashion and he could even see passion in rocks. Happy is he who can follow him there."

Although he dealt with the subject of his choice, logically, for the time being, his general art-outlook was often contradictory. Probably this was traceable to the ceaseless activity of his brain during waking hours, whether at work or during his brief, but frequent, spells of recreation; and to his impatience against restraint of any kind, more especially against restraint of the intellect. Heaven may be reached by more than one route, and so also may the Valhalla towards which all serious artists strive more or less consciously.

In the first collection of his articles issued by C. Lévy, in 1885, under the title "Harmonie et Mélodie," we find such an idea expressed:—

(Apropos Wagner). "Not only do I not deny him, but I glory in having studied him and profited by him, as it was my right and my duty. I have done the same as regards Sebastian Bach, Haydn, Beethoven, Mozart, and all the masters of all the schools. I do not, on that account, consider myself obliged to say, of each one of them, that he alone is god, and that I am his prophet. In reality, it is neither Bach, nor Beethoven, nor Wagner whom I love; it is art. I am an eclectic. This is perhaps a great defect, but it is impossible for me to correct it; one cannot alter one's nature. Again, I love liberty passionately, and cannot bear to have admirations imposed upon me. Enthusiasms to order freeze the blood in my veins, and render me incapable of appreciating the most beautiful works."

Comparing the above quotation with the following one, from "Anarchy in Music" (École Buissonnière), one realises that Saint-Saëns did not always appreciate the other fellow's point of view; or, rather, that although his intelligence saw it, his natural sympathies, lying in the opposite direction, he was inclined to deny that it might also contain truth :—

“ The man with a ‘ developed taste ’ is not the one who knows how to get new and unexpected results by passing from one key to another, as the great Richard did in ‘ Die Meistersinger,’ but rather the man who abandons all keys, and piles up dissonances which he neither introduces nor concludes, and who, as a result grunts his way through music as a pig through a flower garden.

“ Possibly they may go further still. There seems no reason why they should linger on the way to untrammelled freedom, or restrict themselves within a scale. The boundless empire of sound is at their disposal, and let them profit by it. That is what dogs do when they bay at the moon, cats when they mew, and birds when they sing. A German has written a book to prove that the birds sing false. Of course he is wrong, for they do not sing false. If they did, their songs would not sound agreeable to us. They sing outside of scales, and it is delightful, but that is not man-made art.”

Discussing the evolution of opera, from those of the Rossini genre, with their overtures and crescendo, which, in spirit, preserve the custom of the showman banging his drum noisily, and shouting vociferously outside his booth, ere the show (which has been “ just a-goin’ to begin ” for perhaps an hour), actually does begin, to the music-drama of Wagner, where the overture is curtailed to, or rather, replaced by, a prélude; and then to the omission, even of the prélude, by Verdi and Strauss, he concludes, alluding to the suppression of the prélude, “ It is like a dinner without soup.”

Yet this model is one that he has adhered to himself in "Samson et Dalila."

One might quote many examples to illustrate his often amusing manner of expression, but a few must suffice.

Writing of Delsarte ("École Buissonnière"), he observes:—

" . . . for even if masterpieces are presented badly, there is always something left. Besides, both the singer (Delsarte) and his hearer had Faith. He had a way of pronouncing 'Gluck' which aroused expectation even before one heard a note."

Again, in the same volume, he writes, regarding the special métiers of Liszt and of Gounod:

"As there is an odor di femina, there is a parfum d'église, well known to Catholics. Gounod's oratorios are impregnated with this, while it is found in 'Chistus' (of Liszt) very, very feebly, if at all."

He was fond of directing his caustic wit against sham and affectations of all kinds. Delsarte, in the article from which the quotation above is given, receives a fair meed of this form of attention.

In "Portraits et Souvenirs" (1899), another collection of articles, many of which give intimate pen-studies of the famous composers and executants whom the master knew in the course of his long life, one finds this, regarding the futuristic craze, as manifested in music:—

"The situation is reversed. Amateurs who refused to make the least effort to understand music have become possessed by a passion for the obscure and the incomprehensible. They are irritated or disdainful if the instruments of the orchestra do not run from one side to the other like poisoned rats; at a simple accompaniment they shrug their shoulders."

Further (in "École Buissonnière) he writes :

"An artistic people is recognized by their ignorance of 'objects of art,' for in such an environment art is everywhere. An artistic people no more dreams of creating art than a great nobleman of consciously exhibiting a distinguished manner. Distinction lies in his slightest mannerism without his being conscious of the fact. So, among artistic peoples, the most humble and ordinary objects have style."

Regarding the "show" conductor he is, one feels, a little lacking in sympathetic insight. Quite conceivably a very sincere musician, and a very sincere artist, may be permitted to put something of his own individuality into a work which he is conducting—if it is allowable for an executive solo artist to do so, as Saint-Saëns implies on many occasions, but especially in his exceedingly sympathetic reminiscences of Pauline Viardot.

On the other hand, one gladly joins issue in the following attack upon the disgusting abuse of his position which the "show" conductor is prone to make as a result of his own, and his audiences' love of sensation :—

"But the orchestra conductors have to be taken into account. In our day, these gentlemen are virtuosi. Their personalities are not subservient to the music, but the music to them. It is the spring-board on which they perform and parade their all-embracing personalities. They add their own inventions to the author's meaning. Sometimes they draw out the wind instruments so that the musicians have to cut a phrase at the end to catch their breath; again, they affect a mad and unrestrained rapidity which allows time neither to play nor to hear the sounds. They hurry, or retard the pace, for no reason besides their individual caprice."

But I must cease from quotations in this vein or the casual reader may conclude that Saint-Saëns was an uncharitable and bitter old man, than which there could hardly be a greater misapprehension. In Parts I. and II. of this book I have endeavoured to give an impression of his personality: here we are concerned with the formation of an idea of his literary manner.

His use of poetical imagery is effective, but not excessive. It is invariably refined, and does not descend to fulsomeness. Nor is the metaphor that is mixed found in his pages.

Comparing the genius and artistic outlook of Berlioz and Wagner, he writes ("École Buissonnière"):—

" . . . if there is a surprising page in the history of music, it is the persistent affectation of classing Berlioz and Wagner together . . . Berlioz opened to the orchestra the doors to a new world. Wagner hurled himself into this unknown country, and found numerous lands to till there."

"The rose with its fresh colour and its perfume is, in its way, as precious as the sturdy oak. Art has a place for artists of all kinds, and no one should flatter himself that he is the only one who is capable of covering the entire field of art."

Then, a propos, the assumed poor musical taste of the general public:—

“One day I was walking in a garden. There was a bandstand, and musicians were playing some sort of music. The crowd was indifferent, and passed by without paying the slightest attention. Suddenly there sounded the first notes of the delightful Andante of Beethoven’s Symphony in D—a flower of spring with a delicate perfume. At the first notes all walking and talking ceased.”

The following quotations (“Harmonie et Mélodie”) demonstrate his happy gift of allusion:—

“ . . . from the heights of the last act of Götterdämmerung, the entire work appears in its almost supernatural immensity, like the chain of the Alps seen from the summit of Mont Blanc.”

“ . . . a kind of musical Alfred de Musset, Schumann is the man of exquisite things; he knows how to be great in small styles and in small frameworks.”

But for the art of Schumann in general, and for his works as a music critic, Saint-Saëns had scant regard.

Another volume, similar in composition to those already considered, is entitled “Au Courant de la Vie.” It discusses many subjects, from animals, chiefly domestic, of which the composer was very fond, to incidents and reminiscences of travel which, by the way, are also referred to in the “École Buissonnière.”

“Problèmes et Mystères” (1894) gives the student of the master’s life, and, incidentally, of psychology, an insight into the outlook of a cultured and highly intellectual brain towards the conclusion of a long and active life. A very different thing indeed from the “recollections” of vain things and years of frivolling, besprinkled with erotic pen-portraits of the Great, encountered in their aimless gyrations through Life, with which the human butterflies of the world are wont, in these days, to make a frantic endeavour to do something creative before the end; something which may bear their names to posterity.

Compare the lofty idealism, and beautiful conclusions, upon the meaning of life, arrived at by Saint-Saëns, with the cul-de-sac notions of the type of senile abortion referred to:—

“The joys offered us by Nature, which she does not refuse, even to those least favoured among us; that which is procured by the discovery of new truths; the aesthetic enjoyment of Art; the spectacle of sufferings relieved, and the effort to suppress them as much as possible—all this suffice for the happiness of life.”

APPENDIX

APPENDIX

The compositions of Saint-Saëns are mostly published by A. Durand et fils, 4, Place de la Madeleine, Paris. Exceptions to this rule, in the list appended, have the publishers' name in parenthesis. Some of the works are unnumbered.

THE CONCERTOS.

Title.	No.	Composed and Published.	Début.	Incidents.
Concerto in D, pianoforte	Op. 17	1858-9, pub. 1875 Dedicated to Mme. Alfred Jaël.
2nd Ditto, in G minor	Op. 22	1868, pub. 1868	Paris	... Dedicated to Mme. A. de Villers, née de Haber. Composer soloist at début; Rubinstein conductor.
3rd ditto, in E flat	Op. 29	1869, pub. 1875 Dedicated to M. E. M. Delaborde.
4th ditto, in C minor	Op. 44	1875, pub. 1877 Dedicated to M. Antoine Door.
5th ditto, in F	Op. 103	1896, pub. 1896 Dedicated to M. Louis Diémer.
				... Composed during a visit to Egypt.
1st Concerto in A, for violin and orch.	Op. 20	1859, pub. 1868 Dedicated to Sarasate.
2nd ditto, in C	Op. 58	1858, pub. 1879 Dedicated to Sarasate.
3rd ditto, in B minor	Op. 61	1880, pub. 1881 Dedicated to Sarasate.
1st Concerto, in A minor	Op. 33	1872, pub. 1873 Dedicated to M. Auguste Tolbecque, who played it often.
2nd ditto, in D minor	Op. 119	1902, pub. 1902 Dedicated to M. Joseph Hollman.

THE SYMPHONIES AND SYMPHONIC POEMS.

Title.	No.	Composed and Published.	Début.	Incidents.
1st Symphony, in E flat	Op. 2	1853, pub. 1855	Paris	... Dedicated to M. F. Seghers. Gounod and Berlioz discussed the work in the presence of Saint-Saëns unaware it was his. Produced anonymously.
2nd ditto, in F	...	1856, not published
3rd ditto, in D	...	1859, not published
4th ditto, in A minor	Op. 55	1859, pub. 1878	Paris	... Dedicated to M. J. Pasdeloup. Referred to, and published as, the "Second" Symphony. Dedicated to Liszt. Produced by Royal Philharmonic Society. Début conducted by composer. Referred to, and published as, the "Third" Symphony.
5th ditto, in C minor	Op. 78	1886, pub. 1886	London	... Dedicated to Mlle. Augusta Holmès.
Le Rouet d'Omphale	Op. 31	1871, pub. 1872		... Dedicated to Mme. Berthe Pochet, née de Tinan.
Poème symphonique	...
Phaéton	Op. 39	1873, pub. 1875
Danse Macabre	Op. 40	1874, pub. 1875
La Jeunesse d'Hercule	Op. 50	1877, pub. 1877		... Dedicated to M. Henri Duparc.

CHAMBER MUSIC.

Title.	No.	Composed and Published.	Début.	Incidents.
Quintet, pianoforte and strings...	Op. 14	... 1855, pub. 1865 (Hamelles)
Trio, in F, pianoforte, violin, 'cello	Op. 18	... 1863, pub. 1867 (Hamelles)		... Dedicated to M. Alfred Lamarche. Conceived during a holiday in the Pyrenees.
2nd Trio, in E minor, ditto	Op. 92	... 1892, pub. 1892		... Dedicated to Ysaye.
Quartet for strings, No. 1 (2 violins, viola, 'cello)	Op. 112	... 1899, pub. 1899
Ditto, No. 2, ditto	Op. 153	... 1919, pub. 1919	Paris	... Dedicated to M. Jacques Durand.
Quartet, in B flat, for pianoforte, violin, viola, 'cello	Op. 41	... 1875, pub. 1875		... Performed at the 25th (London) anniversary concert, given 7.6.1910, by Hollman, in Queen's Hall, the composer at the pianoforte.
Sonata, No. 1, in C minor pianoforte and 'cello	Op. 32	... 1872, pub. 1873
Ditto, No. 2, in F ditto	Op. 123	... 1905, pub. 1905		... Dedicated to M. Jules Griset.
Sonata, No. 1, violin and pianoforte	Op. 75	... 1885, pub. 1885
Ditto, No. 2, in E flat ditto	Op. 102	... 1896, pub. 1896
Septet, for trumpet, two violins, and viola, 'cello, double bass, and pianoforte	Op. 65	... 1881, pub. 1881	Paris	... Written for a Society known as "La Trompette." Included in programme of celebration concert above mentioned.
Prière, 'cello and organ	Op. 158	... 1920
Sérénade, pianoforte, organ, violin, viola (or 'cello)	Op. 15	... 1866, pub. 1868 (Choudens)
Suite, for 'cello and pianoforte	Op. 16	... 1862, pub. 1866 (Hamelles)

CHAMBER MUSIC—(Continued).

Title.	No.	Composed and Published.	Début.	Incidents.
Romance, pianoforte, organ, violin	Op. 27 ...	1868, pub. 1868 ...
Berceuse, in B flat, for pianoforte and violin	Op. 38 ...	1871, pub. 1874 ...
Allegro appassionato, for 'cello and pianoforte	Op. 43 ...	1875, pub. 1875 ...
Romance, in C, for violin and pianoforte	Op. 48 ...	1874, pub. 1876 ...
Romance, in D, 'cello and pianoforte	Op. 51 ...	1877, pub. 1877 ...
"Wedding-cake" valse-caprice, pianoforte and strings	Op. 76 ...	1885, pub. 1886 ...
Caprice sur des airs Danois et Russes, for pianoforte, flute, oboe, and clarinet	Op. 79 ...	1887, pub. 1887 ...
Le Cygne. Mélodie, for 'cello or violin and pianoforte and solo unpublished pianoforte	Op. ...	pub. 1887 The only published number from the orchestral work, "Le Carnaval des animaux."
Chant Saphique, 'cello and pianoforte	Op. 91 ...	1892, pub. 1892 ...
Morceau de Concert, horn and pianoforte	Op. 94 ...	1887, pub. 1893 ...
Barcarolle, violin, 'cello, har- monium, and pianoforte	Op. 108 ...	1898, pub. 1898 ...
Fantaisie, violin and harp	Op. 124 ...	1907, pub. 1907 ...
Elégie, violin and pianoforte	Op. 143 ...	1915, pub. 1915 ...
Cavatine, tenor trombone and piano	Op. 144

WORKS, OTHER THAN CONCERTOS, FOR SOLO INSTRUMENTS & ORCHESTRA.

Title.	No.	Composed and Published.	Début.	Incidents.
Fantaisie, "Africa," pianoforte and orchestra	Op. 89	... 1891, pub. 1891
Allegro appassionato, pianoforte and orchestra	Op. 70	... 1884, pub. 1884
Rapsodie d'Auvergne, pianoforte and orchestra	Op. 73	... 1884, pub. 1884
Introduction et Rondo capriccioso for violin and orchestra	Op. 28	... 1863, pub. 1870
Morceau de Concert, violin and orchestra	Op. 62	... 1880, pub. 1881
Havanaise, violin and orchestra	Op. 83	... 1887, pub. 1888
Caprice Andalous, violin & orch.	Op. 122	... 1904, pub. 1904
La Muse et la Poète, violin, 'cello, and orchestra (or piano-forte)	Op. 132	... 1909, pub. 1910	London	... Specially composed for the Celebration Concert at Queen's Hall, 7.6.1910, and played then by Ysaye and Hollman. This is the composition that was introduced (anonymously) by Rossini at his house. (See Part I.)
Tarantelle, flute and clarinet and orchestra	Op. 6	... 1857, pub. 1857	Paris.	...
Romance, in F, horn and orch.	Op. 36	... 1874, pub. 1874
Romance, in D flat, flute & orch.	Op. 37	... 1871, pub. 1874
Morceau de Concert, harp and orchestra	Op. 154	... 1919, pub. 1919
Cyprès et Lauriers, organ and orchestra	Op. 156	... 1919

VARIOUS ORCHESTRAL WORKS.

Title.	No.	Composed and Published.	Début.	Incidents.
Overture, "Spartacus"	...	1863, unpublished
Suite. (1) Prélude.	Op. 49 ...	1863, pub. 1877 ...
(2) Sarabande. (3) Gavotte.
(4) Romance. (5) Finale.
Marche Héroïque	...	Op. 34 ... 1871, pub. 1871 ...	Paris	... Dedicated to the memory of Henri Regnault, a friend, killed during the Siege of Paris.
Suite Algérienne.	Op. 60 ...	1880, pub. 1881 ...
(1) Prélude.
(2) Rapsodie Mauresque.
(3) Rêverie du Soir.
(4) Marche Militaire-français.
Une nuit à Lisbonne, Barcarolle for orchestra	Op. 63 ...	1880, pub. 1881 ...
La Jota Aragonese	Op. 64 ...	1880, pub. 1881 ...
Hymn à Victor Hugo, for orchestra, including 8 harps, 8 trumpets, and chorus ad lib.	Op. 69 ...	1881, pub. 1884 ...	Paris	... Performed at the Trocadéro at a celebration in honour of Hugo. The incident led to the re-union of the two friends (Saint-Saëns and Hugo), who had been estranged for years. (See Part I.). ... Unpublished, except for the melody, "Le Cygne."
Le Carnaval des Animaux	...
Sarabande et Rigaudon	...	Op. 93 ... 1892, pub. 1892 ...

VARIOUS ORCHESTRAL WORKS—(Continued).

Title.	No.	Composed and Published.	Début.	Incidents.
Coronation March	... Op. 117	... 1902, pub. 1902	... London	... Written for the Coronation of the late King Edward VII., containing the Sixteenth Century theme used in the opera, "Henry VIII."
Ouverture de Fête	... Op. 133	... 1909, pub. 1910
Marche Interalliée	... Op. 155	... 1919, pub. 1919 To celebrate the end of the war.

WORKS FOR MILITARY BAND.

Orient et Occident	... Op. 25	... 1869, pub. 1870
Hymne Franco-Espagnol 1900, pub. 1901
Sur les bords du nil (Marche Militaire)	Op. 125	... 1908, pub. 1908

COMPOSITIONS FOR PIANO (Solo & Duo).

Six Bagatelles	solo	Op. 3	... 1855, pub. 1856	...
First Mazurka	"	Op. 21	... 1868, pub. 1868	...
Second "	"	Op. 24	... 1871, pub. 1872	...
Third "	"	Op. 66	... 1882, pub. 1883	...
Gavotte	"	Op. 23	... 1871, pub. 1872	...
Romance sans Paroles	"	Op. ?	... 1871, pub. 1872	... (Joubert)
Six Etudes (1st book)	"	Op. 52	... 1877, pub. 1877	...
" " (2nd book)	"	Op. 111	... 1899, pub. 1899	...
Menuet et Valse	"	Op. 56	... 1878, pub. 1878	...
Album	"	Op. 72	... 1884, pub. 1884	...
(1) Prélude	(2) Carillon
(3) Toccata	(4) Valse
(5) Chanson Napolitaine
(6) Finale

COMPOSITIONS FOR PIANO (Solo & Duo)—(Continued).

Title.	No.	Composed and Published.	Début.	Incidents.
Souvenir d'Italie	Op. 80 ...	1887, pub. 1887 ...
Les Cloches du Soir	Op. 85 ...	1889, pub. 1889 ...
Valse Canariote	Op. 88 ...	1890, pub. 1890 ...
Valse Mignon	Op. 104 ...	1896, pub. 1896 ...
Valse Nonchalante	Op. 110 ...	1898, pub. 1898 ...
Valse Langoureuse	Op. 120 ...	1903, pub. 1903 ...
Suite	Op. 90 ...	1891, pub. 1891 ...
(1) Prélude et Fugue
(2) Menuet (3) Gavotte
(4) Gigue
Thème Varié	Op. 97 ...	1894, pub. 1894 ...
Souvenir d'Ismaïlaïa	Op. 100 ...	1895, pub. 1895 ...
Duettino 1 pianoforte, 4 hands	Op. 11 ...	1855, pub. 1861 ... (Hamel)
Koëmig Harald Harfagar	Op. 59 ...	1880, pub. 1880 ... (Bote & Boch, Berlin)		... After the ballad by Heine.
Feuillet d'Album	Op. 81 ...	1887, pub. 1887 ...
Pas redoublé	Op. 86 ...	1887, pub. 1890 ...
Berceuse	Op. 105 ...	1896, pub. 1896 ...
Variations sur un thème de Beethoven	Op. 35 ...	1874, pub. 1874 ...
2 pianofortes, 4 hands
Polonaise	Op. 77 ...	1886, pub. 1886 Performed at the Celebration
Scherzo	Op. 87 ...	1889, pub. 1890 ...		Concert in London, 7.6.1910, by the composer and the late M. Pugno.
Caprice Arabe	Op. 96 ...	1894, pub. 1894 ...
Caprice Héroïque	Op. 106 ...	1898, pub. 1898 ...
Vers la Victoire	... Op. 152 ...	1919, pub. 1919 ...

COMPOSITION FOR HARP (SOLO).

Title.	No.	Composed and Published.	Début.	Incidents.
--------	-----	-------------------------------	--------	------------

Fantaisie ... Op. 95 ... 1893, pub. 1893 ...

COMPOSITIONS FOR ORGAN.

Fantaisie No. 1 ... Op. ? ... 1856, pub. 1875 ...
 " No. 2 ... Op. 101 ... 1895, pub. 1895 ...
 " No. 3 ... Op. 137
 " No. 4 ... Op. 157
 Trois Rapsodies sur des cantiques Op. 7 ... 1866, pub 1866 ...
 Bretons

... Two of these rapsodies are published for orchestra in an amplified version under the same Op. No.

58

Marche Religieuse ... Op. 107 ... 1897, pub. 1898 ...
 Trois Préludes et Fugues (1st book) ... Op. 99 ... 1894, pub. 1894 ...
 " " (2nd book) Op. 109 ... 1898, pub. 1898 ...
 Bénédiction Nuptiale ... Op. 9 ... 1859, pub. 1866 ...

... Performed in Westminster Abbey in February, 1922, at the Wedding of H.R.H. Princess Mary and Viscount Lascelles.

Sept Improvisations pour Grand Op. 150
 Orgue

COMPOSITIONS FOR HARMONIUM.

Trois Morceaux (1) Meditation Op. 1 ... 1852, pub. 1858 ...
 (2) Barcarolle (3) Prière (Girod)
 Six duos for harmonium and Op. 8 ... 1858, pub. 1858 ...
 pianoforte (Fromont)
 Elévation ou Communion ... Op. 13 ... 1865, pub. 1865 ...

WORKS COMPOSED FOR THE STAGE.

Title.	No.	Composed and Published.	Début.	Incidents.
La Princesse Jaune, Opéra-Op. 30 ... 1872, pub. 1872 ... comique, 1 act			Paris ...	Première l'Opéra - Comique, 12.6.1872.
Le Timbre d'Argent, Drame-Op. ? ... 1875-7, pub. by ... lyrique, 4 acts (Choudens)			Paris ...	Première Théâtre - Lyrique, 23.2.1877.
Samson et Dalila, Opéra, 3 acts Op. 47 ... 1868-77, pub. 1877 ...			Weimar ...	Première Grand Ducal Théâtre, Weimar, 2.12.77..
Étienne Marçel, Opéra, 4 acts Op. ? ... 1877-8, pub. 1878 ...			Lyons ...	Première Grand Théâtre, Lyons, 8.2.1879.
Henry VIII., Opéra, 4 acts ... Op. ? ... 1882, pub. 1882 ...			Paris ...	Première Académie Nationale de Musique, Paris, 5.3.1883.
Proserpine, Drame-lyrique, 4 acts Op. ? ... 1886-7, pub. 1887 ...			Paris ...	Première l'Opéra - Comique, Paris, 16.3.1887.
Ascanio, Opéra, 5 acts ... Op. ? ... 1888, pub. 1890 ...			Paris ...	Première l'Opéra, 21.3.1890. Revived there also in 1921.
Phryné, Opéra-comique, 2 acts Op. ? ... 1892-3, pub. 1893 ...			Paris ...	Première l'Opéra - Comique, 24.5.1893.
Frédégonde, Drame - lyrique, Op. ? ... 1895, pub. 1895 ... 5 acts Société d'Edition.			Paris ...	Première l'Opéra, 18.12.1895. The opera was merely completed by Saint-Saëns, being the creation of a friend, Ernest Guiraud.
Les Barbares, Tragédie-lyrique, Op. ? ... 1901, pub. 1901 ... 3 acts and a prologue			Paris ...	Première l'Opéra, 23.10.1901.
Hélène, Poème-lyrique, 1 act ... Op. ? ... 1903, pub. 1904 ...			Monte Carlo.	Première Théâtre de Monte Carlo, 18.2.1904.
L'Ancêtre, Drame-lyrique, 3 acts Op. ? ... 1905, pub. 1906 ...			Monte Carlo.	Première Théâtre de Monte Carlo, 24.2.1906.

WORKS COMPOSED FOR THE STAGE—(Continued).

Title.	No.	Composed and Published.	Début.	Incidents.
Déjanire	... Op. ?	... 1910, pub. 1911	... Monte Carlo.	Première Théâtre de Monte Carlo, 14.3.1911. An adaptation by Saint-Saëns of the libretto and music for Gallet's tragedy, "Déjanire," produced at Béziers in 1898.
Gabriella di Vergy, Opéra-burlesque	...	1885, not published	Paris	... Produced privately and at "La Trompette" (see Part I.)
La blouse et L'Habit or Le fils de la Revolution	...	Not published Produced privately (see Part II.)
Javotte, Ballet, 1 act and 3 tableaux (J. L. Croze)	... Op.	1896, pub. 1896	... Lyons	... Première Grand Théâtre, Lyons, 3.12.1896.

INCIDENTAL MUSIC TO THE FOLLOWING PRODUCTIONS.

Déjanire, Tragédie-lyrique, 4 acts (Louis Gallet)	... 1898, pub. 1898	... Béziers	... Première Théâtre des Arènes, Béziers, 28.8.1898.
Parysatis, Drame-lyrique, 3 acts (Mme. Jane Dieulafoy)	... 1902, pub. 1902	... Béziers	... Première Théâtre des Arènes, Béziers, 17.8.1902.
Antigone, Tragédie, 5 acts (Paul Meurice and A. Vacquerie, after Sopocles)	... 1893, pub. 1893	... Paris	... Première Théâtre Français, 21.11.1894.
Andromaque, Tragédie, 5 acts (Jean Racine)	... 1902, pub. 1902	... Paris	... Première Théâtre Sarah Bernhardt, 7.2.1903.
L'assassinat du duc de Guise. Tableau d'histoire (Henri Lavedau)	... 1908, pub. 1908	... Paris	... Première Salle Charras, 1908.

INCIDENTAL MUSIC TO THE FOLLOWING PRODUCTIONS—(Continued).

Title.	No.	Composed and Published.	Début.	Incidents.
La fille du tourneur d'ivoire, Poème-antique, 2 acts (Mme. Henry Ferrare, after the novel by Madame Jean Bertheroy)	...	1909	Paris	At a special private matinée, 12.6.1909.
La Foi, Trois Tableau Sym- phonique (after Brieux's drama)	Op. 130	1910, pub. 1910

CHORAL WORKS.

Ode à Sainte Cécile	Op. ?	1852, unpublished...
Scène d'Horace (P. Cornéille), soprano, baritone, & orchestra	Op. 10	1860, pub. 1861
Les Noces de Prométhée (Romain Cornut), solo, choir, and orch.	Op. 19	1867, pub. 1867 (Hamelle)
Cantate, for centenary birth of Hoche (words Em. Deschamps)	...	1868, unpublished...	...	Privately produced, 24.6.1868.
Le Déluge, Poème Biblique, in 3 parts, soli, chorus, and orch- estra (words Louis Gallet)	Op. 45	1875, pub. 1876
La Lyre et La Harpe (Victor Hugo), ode for soli, chorus, and orchestra (English version of Hugo's poem by Sydney Samuel and James Donzel)	Op. 57	1879, pub. 1879	Birmingham.	Produced at the Birmingham Musical Festival, 1879.
Nuit Persane (Armand Renaud)	Op. 26 (bis.)	1891, pub. 1892
La Fiancée du Timbalier (Hugo), Ballade for mezzo-soprano and orchestra	Op. 82	1887, pub. 1888
Pallas Athéné (J. L. Croze), soprano and orchestra	Op. ?	1894, pub. 1894

CHORAL WORKS—(Continued).

Title.	No.	Composed and Published.	Début.	Incidents.
Lever de soleil sur le nil (C. Op. ? ... 1898, pub. 1898 ... Saint-Saëns), contralto and orchestra
La Nuit (G. Audigier), soprano Op. 114 ... 1900, pub. 1900 ... solo, female chorus, and orch.
Le Feu Céleste (Armand Sil- vestre), Cantata for soprano, chorus, orchestra, organ, and a reciter	Op. 115 ... 1900, pub. 1900 ...		Paris	... In praise of electricity. Produced at the opening concert, Paris Exhibition, May, 1900.
Lola (Stephan Bordèse), Scène Op. 116 ... 1900, pub. 1900 ... dramatique for two personages and orchestra
La Gloire de Corneille (Seb. C. Op. 126 ... 1906, pub. 1906 ... Lecomte), Cantata, soli, chorus, and orchestra
The Promised Land (Hermann Op. 140 ... 1913, pub. 1913 ... Gloucester ... Produced at the Gloucester Klein), Oratorio, soli, chorus, and orchestra		(Novello)		Musical Festival. Dedicated to H.M. Queen Alexandra.
Messe Solonelle, four voices, soli, Op. 4 ... 1856, pub. 1857 ... chorus, and orchestra				... The Mass which Liszt praised (see Part I.).
Tantum Ergo, chorus and organ Op. 5 ... 1856, pub. 1862 ... (S.A.T.B.; 7 each)
Oratorio de Noël, soli, chorus, Op. 12 ... 1858, pub. 1863 ... Paris and string quintet, harp and organ
Psalm XVIII., Cœli enarrant Op. 42 ... 1865 soli, chorus, and orchestra
Messe de Requiem, soli, chorus, Op. 54 ... 1878 and orchestra			Paris	... Written in eight days for the funeral of M. Libou.

CHORAL WORKS—(Continued).

Title.	No.	Composed and Published.	Début.	Incidents.
Panis Angelicus, tenor solo, string quintet, and organ	Op. ?	... 1898	...
Offertoire pour la Toussaint, 4 voices and organ	Op. ?	... 1898	...
Psaln CL., "Praise Ye the Lord," double chorus, orchestra, and organ	Op. 127	... 1908, pub. 1908 (Shirmer, New York) Written in thanksgiving for the composer's recovery from an illness during his voyage to America.
Laudate Domum, chorus	Op. 149	... 1918	...
Trois Chœurs, for female voices	Op. 151	... 1918	...
Les Soldats de Gédéon (Gallet), double chorus for men	Op. 46
Two Choruses (Hugo)	Op. 53	... 1878, pub. 1878	...
(1) Chanson de Grand-père, two female voices & piano
(2) Chanson d'Ancêtre, baritone solo, with male chorus, pianoforte and orchestra
Two Choruses (Saint-Saëns)	Op. 68	... 1882, pub. 1883	...
(1) Calme des Nuits
(2) Les Fleurs et les Arbres, 4 mixed voices, pianoforte ad lib.
Two Choruses (T. Saint-Felix)	Op. 71	... 1884, pub. 1884	...
(1) Les Marins de Kernor
(2) Les Titans
unaccompanied, 4 male voices

Saint-Saëns has also composed for Church use several settings of motets and hymns :—(1) "Veni Creator"; (2) "Ave Maria"; (3) "Ave Verum"; (4) "O Salutaris"; (5) "Tantum ergo"; (6) "Inviolata"; (7) "Deus Abraham"; (8) "Pie Jesu"; and "Quam dilecta," &c., &c.

LESSER VOCAL WORKS.

Title.	No.	Composed and Published.	Début.	Incidents.
Sérénade d'hiver (Henri Cazabis) 4 male voices	Op. ?	... 1867, pub. 1868	...
Saltarelle (Em. Deschamps) 4 male voices, unaccompanied	Op. 74	... 1885, pub. 1885	...
Les Guerriers, 4 male voices ...	Op. 84
Madrigal (on the Psyché of Molière), tenor solo and male voices	Op. ?	... 1897, pub. 1897	...
Chants d'Automne, 4 male voices	Op. 113	... 1899, pub. 1899	...
Romance du Soir (J. L. Croze), 4 mixed voices, unaccompanied 1902, pub. 1902	...
A la France (J. Combarieu), 4 male or 4 mixed voices unaccompanied	Op. 121	... 1904, pub. 1904	...
Ode d'Horace (Book I., ch. 3), 4 male voices, unaccompanied	Op. ?	... 1905, pub. 1905	...
Le Matin (Lamartine), 4 male voices	Op. 129	... 1908, pub. 1909	...
La Gloire (Auger de Lassus), 4 male voices	Op. 131	... 1909, pub. 1909	...
A Deux (Little Canon for two child's voices)	Op. ?	... 1909 in a sup- plement to "Le Revue Musicale" of 15.7. and 1.10.1909	...
Two Vocal Quartets (1) Des Pas dans l'allée (2) Trinquons	Op. 141	... 1914	...
Hymne au Travail, 4 male voices voices	Op. 142	... 1914	...

LESSER VOCAL WORKS—(Continued).

Title.	No.	Composed and Published.	Début.	Incidents
Ave Maria	...	Op. 145 ...
La Cendre Rouge (G. Docquois),	...	Op. 146 ...
(1) Prélude (2) Ame Triste
(3) Douceur (4) Silence
(5) Pâques (6) Jour de pluie
(7) Amoroso (8) Mai
(9) Petite Main (10) Reviens
Tu es Petrus, 4 voices	...	Op. 147 ...
Quam Dilecta, 4 voices, organ	...	Op. 148 ...
and harp ad lib. God Save the King (translated Op. ? ... 1914 and harmonised)

SONGS (Accompaniment for Pianoforte, unless otherwise stated).

Title.	Words by
Guitare (1851 Choudens)	Victor Hugo
Réverie (1851)	Victor Hugo
Le Pas d'Armes du Roi Jean (1852)	Victor Hugo
La Feuille du Peuplier	Mme. A. Tastu
L'Attente	Victor Hugo
La Cloche	Victor Hugo
Lever de la Lune	?
Pastorale (Duet)	Destouches
Le Sommeil des fleurs	G. de Peumarch
Madonna col Bambino	Victor Hugo
Viens (Duet)
Le Soir descend sur la Colline (Duet)
La Mort d'Ophelia	E. Legouvé

SONGS—(Continued).

Title.		Words by
Souvenances	F. Lemaire
Etoiles du Matin	C. Distel
Extase	Victor Hugo
Soirée en Mer	Victor Hugo
Alla riva del Tebro
Canzonetta Toscana
Le Matin	Victor Hugo
L'Enlèvement	Victor Hugo
Clair de Lune	Catulle Mendès
La Coccinelle	Victor Hugo
A Quoi bon Entendre	Victor Hugo (Choudens)
Le chant de ceux qui vont sur la mer	Victor Hugo (Choudens)
Tristesse	F. Lemaire
Marquise, vous souvenez vous?	F. Coppée (Choudens)
Maria Lucrezia	F. Legouvé
Mélodies Persanes (Six Songs, Op. 26)	Armand Renaud
A Voice by the Cedar Tree	Tennyson (Augener)
Night Song of Presiosa	T. Ginner (Boosey)
Si Vous n'avez rien à me dire	Victor Hugo
Désir de L'Orient	Saint-Saëns
My Land	T. Davis (Boosey)
Dans ton Cœur	Henri Cazalis
Danse Macabre	Henri Cazalis
Vogue, Vogue la galère	Jean Aicard
Dans les coins bleus	Sainte-Beuve
Une flûte invisible	Victor Hugo
Suzette et Suzon	Victor Hugo
Chanson à boire du Vieux Temps	N. Boileau
Présage de la Croix	S. Bordes
Guitares et Mandolines	Saint-Saëns
Amour Viril	G. Boyer

SONGS—(Continued).

Title.

Words by

Aimous Nous	T. de Banville
Là-bas	J. L. Croze
Madeleine	A. Tranchant
Les Fées (piano-forte accompaniment, 4 hands)	T. de Banville
Fièvre Beauté	A. Mahot
Le Rossignol	T. de Banville
La Sérénité	Mme. M. Barbier
Primavera	P. Stuart
La Libellule	Saint-Saëns
Vive Paris, Vive la France	A. Tranchant (Margueritat),
Pourquoi rester Seulette	J. L. Croze
Peut-être	J. L. Croze
Vénus	Saint-Saëns
Sonnet	A. Tranchant
Si je l'osais	Saint-Saëns
Les Cloches de la Mer	Saint-Saëns
Thème Varié	Quinault
Nocturne	S. Sicard
Les Vendanges (Hymne populaire)	C. Lecocq
Elle	F. Perpina
Désir d'Amour	J. Moréas
L'Arbre	G. Audigier
La Fleuve	A. Pressat
Sœur Anne	Prince Haïdar Pacha
L'Etoile	Ronsard
L'Amour Oyseau	Mme. de Noailles
Soir romantique	A. Agnès
Violon dans le Soir (Violin obbligato)	A. Agnès
Angélus	R. de Léché
Où nous avous aimé
Papillous

SONGS—(Continued).

Title.

		Words by
S'il est un charmant gazon	(1915)	Victor Hugo
Vive la France	(1915)	P. Fournier
Victoire	(1918)	P. Fournier
La Française (Chant héroïque de la Grande Guerre)	...	N. Zamacois
Ne l'oubliez pas	(1915)	...
Les Sapins	(1914)	P. Martin
Honneur à l'Amerique	(1917)	...

TRANSCRIPTIONS BY SAINT-SAËNS.

Composer.	Work Transcribed.	Transcription for
J. S. Bach	...	Pianoforte (Six, No. 1)
J. S. Bach	...	Pianoforte (Six, No. 2)
J. S. Bach	Prélude, Sixth Sonata for violin	... With pianoforte accompaniment
J. S. Bach	Sarabande, violin	... With pianoforte accomp't or orchestra
L. Van Beethoven	Ruins of Athens (Chorus of Dervishes)	... Pianoforte
L. Van Beethoven	String Quartets	... Pianoforte (three transcriptions)
L. Van Beethoven	Concerto in G, for pianoforte & orchestra...	... Pedal point added
L. Van Beethoven	" " for violin and orchestra...	... Cadenzas added
Hector Berlioz	Damnation de Faust (Easter Hymn)	... Pianoforte
Hector Berlioz	Lélio	... Pianoforte score (Costallat)
Georges Bizet	Les Pécheurs de Perles (Scherzo)	... Pianoforte (Choudens)
F. Chopin	Sonata in B flat minor	... Arranged for two pianofortes
Henri Duparc	Lenore (Poème Symphonique)	... Arranged for two pianofortes (Rouart)
		... Lerolle)
Jacques Durand	Chansons des Mancoix	... Pianoforte
A. Duvernoy	Hellé (Nocturne)	... Pianoforte (Enoch)
Gluck	Alceste (opera)	... Caprice sur les airs de ballet for pianoforte

TRANSCRIPTIONS BY SAINT-SAËNS—(Continued).

Composer.	Work Transcribed.	Transcription for
Gluck	Orphée (opera)	... Menuet arranged for pianoforte
Charles Gounod	... Faust (opera ; Kermesse)	... Pianoforte (Choudens)
Charles Gounod	... Faust (opera ; Valse)	... Pianoforte (Choudens)
Charles Gounod	... Gallia	... Paraphrase for pianoforte (Novello)
Charles Gounod	... Faust (opera ; Kermesse et Valse)	... Pianoforte (Choudens)
Charles Gounod	... Concert Suite	... Arranged for two pianofortes (Leduc)
Haydn	... Symphony No. 36 (Andante)	... Arranged for pianoforte
F. Liszt	... Beethoven Cantata	... Improvisation for pianoforte (Kahnt, Leipzig)
F. Liszt	... Orphée (Poème Symphonique)	... Arranged for pianoforte, violin, et violoncello (Breitkopf and Härtel)
F. Liszt	... La Perédication aux oiseaux (Legend pour piano)	... Organ (Rozsavolgyi, Buda-Pesth)
Lwoff	... Fantasia on Russian National Anthem (i.e. , pre-war)	... Pianoforte (Leduc)
J. Massenet	... Thais (opera)	... Pianoforte paraphrase (Heugel)
F. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy.	Midsummer Night's Dream (Scherzo)	... Pianoforte
L. Milan de Valence	... Two Fantasias for lute	... Pianoforte
(16th Century Spanish composer)
W. Mozart	... Andante	... Pianoforte and violin, or orchestra
Paladilhe	... La Mandolinata	... Pianoforte paraphrase (Heugel)
Henri Reber	... Four Symphonies	... Pianoforte duet (Costallat)
R. Schumann	... Night Song	... Pianoforte or orchestra
R. Wagner	... Lohengrin (opera ; Marche religieuse)	... Pianoforte, violin, and organ
Paladilhe	... La Islaña	... Pianoforte paraphrase (Heugel)

LITERARY WORKS BY SAINT-SAËNS.

Title.

Title.	Date.	Publisher.
Harmonie et Mélodie	... 1885	C. Lévy
Notes sur les décors de Théâtre dans l'antiquité romaine	... 1886	Baschet
Rimes familières	... 1891	C. Lévy
Les Crampes des écrivains (comedy, produced at Algiera)	... 1892	C. Lévy
Charles Gounod, et le "Don Juan", de Mozart	... 1893	P. Ollendorff
Problèmes et Mystères	... 1894	Flammarion
Preface à Hypnotisme, Religion by Dr. Felix Regnault	... 1897	Schleicher frères
Portraits et Souvenirs	... 1899	Société d'éditions artistique
Essai sur les lyres et cithares antiques	... 1902	Didot
Le Roi Apépi (comedy after Cherbulicz, produced at Béziers	... 1903	C. Lévy
La Art du Théâtre (preface à Les Annales du Théâtre et de la	... 1904	P. Ollendorff Musique, by E. Stoullig)
Preface to Histoire de la Musique, by Paul Viardot	... 1905	P. Ollendorff
Preface to Pieces de Clavecin de Rameau	... 1905	Durand
Preface to Gounod, by J. G. Prod'homme and A. Dandelot	... 1911	Delagrave
École Buissonnière	... 1913	Pierre Lafitte
Au Courant de la Vie	... 1914	Dorbon-ainé
Germanophile	... 1916	Dorbon-ainé
Les Idées de M. Vincent d'Indy	... 1919	Pierre Lafitte
Musical Memories (being an English translation (E. Giles Rich) of	... 1921	John Murray
23 of the 36 essays in "École Buissonnière")

Saint-Saëns for many years wrote letters to the leading Parisian musical press :—"Le Revue Musicale"; "Le Monde Musical"; "Comœdia"; "Le Nouvelle Revue."

BIBLIOGRAPHY.

(Unless otherwise stated the following Books are in French.)

Title.	Author.	Date.	Publisher.
Henry VIII.	... Ch. Gounod	... 1883 ...	Imprimerie chaix
Henry VIII., et l'Opéra	... E. Hippeau	... 1883 ...	Imp. de Schiller
Profilis de Musiciens	... Hugues Imbert	... 1888 ...	Fischbacher
M. Camille Saint-Saëns	... Camille Bellaigue	... 1889 ...	Durand
Ascanio	... Ch. Gounod	... 1890 ...	Durand
Notations Artistiques	... Guy Ropartz	... 1891 ...	Lemerre
Musiciens d'Aujourd'hui (1st volume)	... Adolphe Jullien	... 1892 ...	Lib. de l'Art
" " (2nd volume)	... Adolphe Jullien	... 1894 ...	Lib. de l'Art
Masters of French Music	... Arthur Bervey (English).	... 1894 ...	Osgood, McIlvaine
Franz Liszt, "Letters"	... Collected and edited by ... La Mara and trans- lated by Constance Bache (English)	... 1894 ...	H. Grevel & Co.
Mémoires d'un artiste	... Ch. Gounod	... 1896 ...	C. Lévy
Une Partition méconnue, Proserpine	... Etienne Destranges	... 1895 ...	Fischbacher
Musique	... Adolphe Jullien	... 1896 ...	Fischbacher
La Musique Française moderne	... Georges Servières	... 1897 ...	Havard
Camille Saint-Saëns	... Otto Neitzel (German)	... 1899 ...	Harmonie (Berlin)
Camille Saint-Saëns and Déjanire	... Emile Baumann	... 1900 ...	Durand
Musiques d'Hier et de Demain	... Alfred Bruneau	... 1900 ...	Fasquelle
Mastersingers	... Filson Young (English)	... 1901 ...	W. Reeves
La Musique Française	... Alfred Bruneau	... 1901 ...	Fasquelle
From Greig to Brahms	... Dan Gregory Mason (English)	... 1901 ...	Outlook Co. (New York)
Musiques de Russie et Musiciens de France	... Alfred Bruneau	... 1903 ...	Fasquelle
French Music in the 19th Century	... Arthur Hervey (English).	... 1903 ...	Grant Richards
Groves' Dictionary of Musicians	... J. A. Fuller-Maitland Editor (English)	... 1904 ...	Macmillan

BIBLIOGRAPHY—(Continued).

Title.	Author.	Date.	Publisher.
Les Grandes Formes de la Musique, L'œuvre ...	Emile Baumann	... 1905 ...	P. Ollendorff
de C. Saint-Saëns
Consonnances et Dissonances	... Etienne Destranges	... 1906 ...	Fischbacher
Samson et Dalila	... Etienne Destranges	Durand
Programme Music in the last four centuries	... Frederick Niecks, Mus. Doc. (English)	... 1906 ...	Novello
Musiciens d'Aujourd'hui	... Romain Rolland	... 1908 ...	Hachette
Cours de Composition Musicale	... Vincent d'Indy	... 1909 ...	Durand
Musiciens d'Hier et d'Aujourd'hui	... Adolphe Jullien	1910 ...	Fischbacher
Musiciens Française d'Aujourd'hui	... Octave Séré	... 1911 ...	Mercure de France
The History of the Philharmonic Society of London	... Myles Birket Foster (English)	... 1912 ...	John Lane
C. Saint-Saëns	... Jean Bonnerot	... 1914 ...	Durand
Memories of a Musician	... W. Ganz (English)	... 1913 ...	John Murray
Reminiscences, Impressions and Anecdotes	... Francesco Berger (English)	Samson, Low, Marston & Co.
Camille Saint-Saëns	... Jean Montargis	... 1919 ...	La Renaissance du Livre
Saint-Saëns	... Arthur Hervey (English)	... 1921 ...	John Lane

UNIVERSAL
LIBRARY

141 022

UNIVERSAL
LIBRARY

